HORSE KILLED BY LIGHTNING.

On Friday night the 2nd inst. during a thunder storm at this place, a horse belonging to Mr. Rankin Pouge, was struck by lightning and instantly killed. "Old Doc," (this was the horse's name) was standing by an oak tree about one hundred and fifty yards from Mr. Pouge's house,—the tree was marked slightly by the descending current and from appearances the horse received the entire charge of electric fluid. Two other horses and one mule were in the same lot at the time, but luckily were not near enough the tree to be hurt, though one had a shoe torn off about 30 feet from the tree.

A large and attentive congregation were well entertained by two excellent sermons by Rev. A. A. P. Neal, at Mt. Pleasant, on yesterday the 4th inst., dinner on the ground about; about 400 people were present. Collection over $10.00.

PRUNELLA.

Another murder goes on record, this time at Alleghany Station. Two colored men, named Dick Winston and —— Ramsey, both railroad hands, got into an altercation on Sunday evening concerning Winston's wife, whom Winston accused Ramsey of trying to poison. During the quarrel Ramsey drew a pistol and shot Winston in the right side. Ramsey escaped, and Winston will die.—Ronceverte Messenger.

Killed at Fort Spring.

On last Saturday night about nine o'clock, Mr. Andrew Surgeon, railroad employe at the Fort Spring depot, was instantly killed by the second section of No. 31. He was walking on the track, when the train overtook him, carrying the mail from the postoffice to the depot, as usual, and, strange to say, although the engine whistled and the trainmen shouted, he never left the track until struck by the engine and his brains dashed out. The supposition is that he thought he was on the side-track, and therefore paid no attention to the signals. Mr. Surgeon was 60 years of age, and had been connected with the railroad at Fort Spring ever since a depot has been established there—Ronceverte News.

Another One.

A charter has been issued to the Gauley & Eastern Railway Company, organized for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from the mouth of Gauley river to Huntersville, Pocahontas Co. The principal office to be kept in this city and the charter to continue perpetually. The capital stock is $2,000, and shares are $100 each, of which E. W. Kelley, of New York holds sixteen; and L. D. Kelley, of New York, and E. W. Knight, H. B. Smith, and Geo. S. Couch, of this city, hold one each. This road, when constructed, will run through one of the finest coal and timber regions of the State.—Charleston Gazette.

Must be some mistake about the Capital Stock. Certainly a railroad could not be built 30 miles or more with a Capital stock of $2,000.

"You idiot, can't you get your mouth open?"

There were twenty-five men lying on the decks and in the cabin sound asleep. No! Dead! Every one of them dead and cold, and I the only living thing aboard. It took some time to explain matters and get at all the particulars, but with what I could tell them and what they could see it finaly became plain to all. That barrel of wine had been dosed with some deadly drug. The cook must have done it previous to the attack, or the bung had been left out by another, and some poisonous reptile had crept in to die. No one could tell for certain, but the drinkers were all dead, and all had died in sleep. The ship was English, and the schooner was over thirty miles off the land. One of H. M. men-of-war, assisted by a civil functionary, attempted an investigation, but nothing came of it. Our crew had been slaughtered and the schooner captured, but she had recaptured herself and brought off twenty-five corpses. Not a living man could ever be found among the islands who would acknowledge that he had ever seen the schooner, much less participated in her capture.

Not long after the war a circus came to Montgomery. It was the first circus that had been there in a long time and attracted an immense crowd, especially of the negroes. The most interesting feature of the entertainment was the balloon ascension. The negroes had never seen anything of that kind, and regarded the spectacle of a man sailing up into the clouds very much as they would have looked upon Elijah going up in a chariot of fire. The balloon sailed away eight or ten miles and came down in a field where some negroes were plowing. Therrified at the spectacle of a chariot coming down from heaven they verily believed that the last great day had come, and remembered all their shortcomings, fled away in terror at the approach of the awful judge. One grey-headed and rheumatic old negro was unable to get away. He could follow the plough but could not run, and the chariot came down on him with terible swiftness. At that awful moment his whole life rushed upon him. He thought of all the petty sins he had committed, and the ghosts of a hundred chickens seemed to rise up in judgment against him. But in that desperate emergency his mind did not desert him, and remembering that politeness always counted with his earthly master he quickly decided to greet the Lord of heaven and earth in becoming style. As the aeronaut touched the earth and began to entangle himself from the meshes about his car the old darkey, with an air of profound obedience, removed the wool hat from his shipate, bowed low and said with pious unction:

"Morning, Mars Jesus, how you bo' yous pa?"

Prompt Payment of Small Bills.

A wealthy banker in one of our large subscriptions to charities, and has kindly habits of private benevolence, was called on one evening, and asked to go to help a man who had attempted suicide. They found the man in a wretched house in an alley not far from the bakers dwelling. The front room was a cobble's shop; behind it, on a miserable bed in the kitchen, lay the poor shoemaker, with a gaping gash in his throat, while his wife and children were gathered about him.

"We have been without food for days," said the woman, when be returned. "It is not my husband's fault. He is a hard-working, sober man. To-day, he went for the last time to collect a debt due him by a rich family, but the gentleman was not at home." My husband was weak from fasting, and seeing us starving drove him mad. So it ended that way," turning to the fainting, motionless figure on the bed.

The banker having warmed and fed the family, hurried home, opened his desk, and took out a file of little bills. All his debts were promptly met, but he was apt to be careless about the accounts of milk, bread etc., because they were so petty. He found that there was a bill of Michael Goodlow's for repairing shoes, $10 Michael Goodlow was the suicide. It was the banker's unpaid debt which had brought these people to the verge of the grave, and driven this man to desperation, while at the very time the banker had given away thousands in charity.—The Record of Christian Work.

A printer once made this mistake, "Mr. and Mrs.—— respectfully, request your presents at the marriage of their daughter."

"You printed a story about an Irishman who was threatened by a priest with being turned into a rat unless he quit drinking and beating his wife," said a friend who gathers up anecdotes of that sort. "Let me tell you one. It isn't new, but I have never seen it printed."

I squared myself and he proceeded:

"Patrick Maginnis went to confession and among other sins, confessed to the good father that he had stolen Mrs. Mulcahy's pig, the loss of which had been a great bloom to the poor woman.

"'Stole Mrs. Mulcahy's gig did ye? That's very bad, Patrick—very bad. Don't you know Pat, that to steal a pig is a haynious sin, and to steal Mrs. Mulcahy's pig is worse? What will ye say on the day of judgment when Mrs. Mulcahy confronts you before the Lord an' charges ye with stealin' her pig —what'll ye say?'

"Pat looked rather glum at this onslahght but at this point he perked up and said:

"'Sure, yer riverince, Mrs. Mulcahy won't be there.'

"'Indade; and why not, Pat Maginis? Mrs. Mulcahy will be there an' the pig'll be there, an' when yer asked why ye stole the widdy's pig what'll ye say, I'm wantin to know?'

"'Will Mrs. Mulcahy be there?' asked Pat, a great idea illuminating his face.

"'She will,' said the good father severely.

"'And will the pig be there?'

"'Certainly.'

"'Then, begorra,' said Pat, triumphantly, 'I'll say: "Mrs. Mulcahy, there's your pig.,"'

The Preacher's Snake Story.

Rev. C. W. Parker a respectable preacher, of Bremen, Ga., is authority for the following tale:

Dr. I N. Chaney used to practice medicine in Carrolton. He now keeps a hotel in Bremen. He went to Carr-lton the other day in his buggy, and while there traded an old debt for a good horse, and started out for Cremen in his buggy, leading his new horse.

When he was nearing the little Tallapoosa river bridge at Kingsberry's mill, he suddenly heard a roaring noise among the trees, which he instantly supposed to be a storm. Looking up the hill he saw the forest in commotion, and the trees falling and bending toward him, and in the midst a huge body which proved to be a snake. The doctor put whip to his horse and was quickly on the bridge. Feeling the buggy jerk, he looked back and saw the snake swallow the horse he was leading and plunge into the river as the snake poked his head out on the other bank of the stream, his tail was still up on the side of the hill, his body reached clear across the river.

The horse having on new shoes kicked through the stomache of the snake, and the snake stopped, and the stream was damned, and the water rose and floated the snake to a level with the bridge. The doctor jumped out of his buggy, took out a big knife, and cutting the hole larger where the horse's feet were sticking out of the snake's body, the horse flounced out and mounted the bridge. The doctor secured him to his buggy and drove on, but by this time the water had backed up till the horse had to swim to low ground, but made their escape.—Ex.

Lieutenant Habenichts (who owed everybody)—Ah, my, Miss Goldbird, how many could be made happy by this little hand.

Miss Goldbird (an heiress)—Many! I thought only one could be made happy by my hand.

Not if you give me your hand, Miss Goldbird.

(He was thinking of his numerous creditors.)

A Stranger who was making loud inquiries at the City hall yesterday for the Mayor was finaly asked by an officer to state his errand.

"I want to make a complaint against the way I was used at the postoffice," he replied.

"But the Mayor has nothing to do with the postoffice."

"He hasn't?"

"No, sir. Uncle Sam runs that."

"Well, I've had my satchel stolen, and I want to see him about that."

"It's no use, sir. You should go to the police."

"Hasn't the Mayor anything to do with it?"

"Not a thing."

"But they put me off a street car up here. I want to see him about that."

"He couldn't help you any."

"Say! You don't mean to tell me that your Mayor hasn't got any power, do you?"

"Not in such cases."

"Hump! Just sits right in his office, eh? Just smokes cigars and looks big and bosses the City hall, eh? Say! What's the use? If a feller can't boss the whole roost, what's the use of holding office? Say! I'm sorry for him. Give him my love and tell him he has my sympathy."

"Good many flies in here," he said to a shoemaker on Champlain street as he sat down to have a lift put on the heel of his shoe.

"Yes."

"Never tried to drive 'em out'did you?"

"No."

"Don't want to keep 'em on the outside, I suppose?"

"No."

"Wouldn't put up a screen door then if any one should give you one?"

"No."

"You must be the house-fly's friend."

"My frendt, I vhas sooch a man dot I like eaferypody to get along all right. If you pitch on some flies he vhas mad; if you gif him a shance maype he goes py himself und does vhell und vhas your frendt."

When two women are bosom friends or deadly enemies, you may always ask, "Where is the man."

Woman live and die by their passions, but not themselves.

The love of certain women is deadly; but most men become accustomed to it, as they do to slow poison.

Some men take women as they do champagne; but others indulge in them as they do in absinthe.

The lives of women can be divided into three epochs: They dream of love; they experienced its and they regret it.

Woman's virtue is like her beauty. One cannot define its beginning nor its end.

"Laura," said the young lady's mother, not unkindly, "it seems to me that you had the gas turned rather low last evening

"It was solely for economy, mamma," answered the maiden.

"There is no use trying to beat the gas company, my daughter. I have noticed that the shutting off of the gas is always followed by a corresponding increase of pressure."

"Well, that lessens the waist doesn't it, mamma, dear," replied the artless girl. And her fond parent could find no more to say.

Foreman—You might as well look for another job, Jerry.

What for?" What I done?

"Your trowelful of mortar struck the owner of the building down on the first floor."

"Let him keep out of the way. If the bell strikes 12 when I've got a trowel of mortar I don't care where it drops."

Excuse of the girl who recently eloped with her coachman: I was driven to it.

Dickens used to tell a story of meeting with a clergyman in a railway train, who held forth to his fellow passengers ever so long over the novelist's private failings, "Dickens is an Atheist, sir, as I happen to know; he is also a gambler, and I regret to say, drinks," and so on. "Dear me, how sad. Have you ever seen him drunk," asked Dickens. "Well, not exactly drunk; no—but certainly overtaken by liquor." Have you ever seen him sober?" "Well, that is too much to say. Oh, yes, I have seen him sober." "Often?" "Yes often." "No, sir, only once. You see him now for the first time." (Curtain.)

BLACK CLOUD'S SON.

A GOVERNMENT RIDER'S STORY

There will never be another Indian outbreak serious enough to call for the action of a full regiment of soldiers in suppressing it. The extermination of the buffalo was the death-blow to the hostile Indian. Added to that, the building of the railroad lines flooded the West with emigrants, miners, hunters and tourist, and the Indian found himself hedged in by circumstances. The red man is no longer a warrior. He is down, and down pretty low, and it is the beginning of the end. He is doomed to follow the buffalo, and his total extinction will be regretted only by the few philanthropists who argued for him as a theory, and never came in physical contact.

No human being ever came nearer being a fiend than an Apache Indian. The Pawnees, Blackfeet and Cheyennes were wicked enough but the Apache had traits of his own—a fiendishness which other tribes might imitate but could not equal. He was born crafty and cruel. He never had the slightest feeling of mercy or pity from the cradle to the grave. He was never so much amused as when assisting to torture some living thing. He was never so satisfied as when planning to take life.

A year previous to the time General Custer was ordered West to begin a vigorous campaign against the Indians, the Apaches were in their glory, and they boasted that they could defeat any force of soldiers sent against them. I was scouting and mail-carrying in Texas for the Government, and after many close shaves was finanly captured by the red imps. It is of that incident I am going to write.

A month before my capture I was out on a scout on the Rio Pecos River, our party numbering eighteen men. We were well mounted and moving quickly from point to point. One day at noon we went into camp in a grove of cotton woods, and before I had unsaddled the Lieutenant in command informed me that he had lost his revolver from its holster during the last mile of our ride, and asked me to ride back in search. Instead of riding I returned on foot, and had the luck to find the weapon only about a quarter of a mile away. I then cut across an elbow to reach the grove, and when within stone's throw came suddenly upon an Indian pony in a dry gulch, and at the same instant discovered his owner crouched behind a boulder with his back to me and his face to the grove. I had him under my rifle before he could turn his head. Indeed, my finger was on the trigger when I saw that he was a boy. He had a rifle in his hands, but I called out to him to lay it down or I would fire, and after a moments hesitation he obeyed. Then, as I kept him covered at a distance of only seven or eight feet, I called to the men in the grove, and several of them came hurrying down in response.

I had captured a son of Black Cloud, Chief of one of the Apache bands, and the boy was named after his father. He was only fourteen years old, and his presence there exemplified the ruling traits of Apache character. Three hours before, he had discovered our party while out hunting with a party of his own. They dared not make an open attack, but the young Chief had sent his people away and then cut across the country to the grove, planning that we would halt there. Single handed and alone he was going to pick off the Lieutenant, and then make his escape to boast of it. We had splendid horses and were all old campaigners, and the boy would not have had one chance in ten to get away. He must have realized it, and yet he was willing to run the risks. He was greatly chagrined and cast down by his capture. We had finished our scout and were on our way back to Fort McKavett, and we determined to carry him in prisoner. When he was informed of this he earnestly begged me to kill him, saying that he could never hold up his head among his people again. Had he been wounded and rendered helpless it would not have been so bad; but to be taken as he was would forever disgrace him. We bound him fast to his pony, secured the animal against a break for liberty, and set out for the fort.

The boy was sullen and defiant for a time, refusing to answer any question, but after a while, when I had told him that he would not be harmed, and that his capture under the circumstances redounded to his credit, he thawed out a little. Three hours after his capture we got sight of a single Indian a mile away to our right on a knoll, and as we halted young Black Cloud informed me that it was one of his tribe, who wanted to have a talk with us. Signals were exchanged between the two, and the stranger soon came galloping in. He was one of the hunting party, and had been dodging us for twenty miles to find out if the boy had been captured. He was a fine looking fellow, and as he halted in our midst, and saw the ignoble situation of the boy his first thought was to fight for him. I called his attention to the fact that any move of his would result in the death of them both, and then explained how the youth was captured. Knowing the conceit of the tribe I spread it on very thick, alleging that it required our whole force to make the capture, and it was not accomplished then without a hard fight. This falsehood made the boy my friend for life, while it put the other in better humor. I stated that young Black Cloud would be taken to the fort and held prisoner until exchanged for some white captive, and gave my word that he would be well treated. meanwhile. He sent a message to his father to the effect that he was not afraid, and hoped to be at liberty in a few days, and two hours later we had him safely lodged in the guard house at the fort. His capture was looked upon as a good thing, for we knew that his tribe would gladly exchange two or three white prisoners for him.

Two weeks after the capture of young Black Cloud I was called into the Colonel's office one evening, and asked if I thought it possible to get through to Fort Concho with despatches. The country was then in the possession of the hostiles. The Pecos warriors had come down out of New Mexico to make common cause against the whites, and the Kiowas, Cheyennes, Chickasaws, Seminoles, and Shawnees were all out in the country to the north and east. The Apaches had us almost in a state of siege, being seen every day within five miles of the post, and the chances of making a sixty mile ride across the plains lying between the two forts without running against a party of hostiles was not one in fifty. At such periods our times a Government rider is not commanded to go. He is asked certain questions, however, in a manner which decides him to make the attempt. I left the post at 9 o'clock at night of an August evening perfectly satisfied that I should be dead or a prisoner before midnight. I had a bronco of tireless gait, a rifle and revolver, and I carried only five or six pounds extra weight. Before setting out I went in to see young Black Cloud and say good by. I had spent much of my time in his company, and we had become pretty good friends. When I told him of my journey he took from his neck a buckskin string, to which was attached the tooth of a grizzly bear, and handed it to me with the remark:

"You cannot get through. You will be captured or killed. If not shot down, show this to my people. They will know who it belongs to. They may trade you for me, and I shall thus get back to my tribe."

A thunder storm was coming up as I took my departure. Instead of holding due north, on the direct route, I rode to the east for five miles and then held away for Concho direct. The storm now broke, and for a full hour I rode ahead at a steady gallop, one moment in darkness so black that I could not see the ears of my horse, and the next in a blaze of light so brilliant that it blinded me. By the time the storm had passed I was a good fifteen miles from the fort, and as I had seen nothing to alarm me I began to hope that I would get through all right. It was between 10 and 11 o'clock, and I had pulled my broncho down to a walk for the first time, when he suddenly uttered a snort of alarm and started off with wild jumps. Three or four rifles cracked, and as the reports reached me the horse fell in a heap and flung me far over his head. I was momentarily stunned by the fall, and before I had made a move to get up I was seized by at least three Indians, who were not a minute in binding my hands and feet. When I got a clear head once more it was to realize that the Apaches had me a secure prisoner, and that, there were six or seven warriors about me. The moon came up in a clear sky a little latter, and then I made out that I had run directly into a contemporary camp. The shots fired after me had brought down my horse, and he lay groaning and floundering a few yards away.

The Indians knew that I was a white man, but they didn't know who they had got hold of until morning came. During the interval I lay on the wet ground guarded by two of the warriors, and almost immediately after my capture two men were sent off in different directions with news of it. A party of twelve Apaches arrived just before daylight and ten more at sunrise, and among the latter I recognized Black Cloud, father of the boy. One of the men had recognized me as "The white man who hurries," as the Government riders were called, and as being in the party who captured the Chief's son. No one ever saw such a mad lot of redskins before or since. They wanted to torture me, and yet they realized that through me the boy could obtain his liberty. The Chief at first declared that he had disowned his son, and that he might rot in confinement before he would exchange a white prisoner for him. When I called his attention to the charm young Black Cloud had given me the old man pretended to believe that it was a sign the boy was dead, and he ordered my immediate torture. I was jerked to a sitting position, my boot cut off, and the devils were about to use their knives on my feet when the old man changed his mind and restrained them. The sight of me before them was the same as a pail of fresh blood placed before ravenous wolves, and I expected to be knifed or tomahawked every moment for the first half hour. When they had cooled down a little Black Cloud demanded the particulars of his boy's capture. I saw that he felt degraded over the event, and was ready to disown the youth, and I made out a strong defence for the little chap to save my own scalp.

It was finanly decided to spare my life for a few days, and I was conducted to a camp in the foothills between the two forts. Here a council was held, and I had a close shave of it. While Black Cloud wanted his son back, some of his advisers contended that he should wait until securing some cheaper prisoner. They insisted on making me out a very important personage, and it was well known that I had killed or wounded several of the tribe in different scrimmages. Another thing that bothered them was how to make the exchange and not get beaten. Treacherous and deceitful to the last degree themselves, they would not credit the whites with having any honor. It was argued, too, that the commander of the fort would exchange the boy for a private soldier or any sort of prisoner, and that I had done them too much damage to be set at liberty. There were three days in which my fate was undecided, and during the last day a stake was driven and fagots collected for a fire to torture me. I had no voice in the council, being bound and under guard, but it was at length decided to make the exchange. So cautious and fearful were the Indians that it took a week to effect what might have been done in a day. I wrote a note to the commandant explaining the situation. This was carried in by a squaw, who was permitted to see and converse with young Black Cloud. He replied that he would exchange. The Apaches then wanted the boy turned loose before they released me, but this I would not hear to, knowing they would murder me. It was finally arranged that he was to be escorted a mile outside the fort and turned loose on his horse. I was to be taken to within a mile of the fort, and turned loose on foot. The parties were to occupy eminences half a mile apart, and the hour was to be 9 o'clock in the morning. This plan was carried out. Twenty soldiers came out with the boy, and about the same number of Apaches escorted me. The treachery of the copper faced fiends was soon exemplified. They had posted five warriors in a dry run to shoot me down as I made for the fort. The boy doubtless suspected some such move, for as soon as released he came galloping straight for me, and after a "how how" and a hand shake he insisted that I walk beside his pony until we reached the gate of the fort. When I was safe he waved his hand and rode away to be received with yells and cheers and it was then we saw the treacherous rascals creeping out of the cover where they had been stationed. A year later, after a fight in which over forty of the bravest Apache warriors had gone to earth I found young Black Cloud among the dead, having been hit four times. He had a Winchester and a revolver from which every cartridge had been fired.

Give American Labor a Chance.

First class American work is not only the best of its kind in the world, but the output for a given plant is much greater. It is not the machines or the methods alone that accomplish this last, but the social status of the workman also. This is an inexplicable position to foreigners, who do not accord workingmen any social standing whatever, but it is a mighty fact here. American workmen do more work because they are more intelligent, and are a part of all they undertake; they have more at stake. They care little about the the quality of their beer, but very much about the houses they live in and the clothing they wear. Their great solicitude anxiety is that their children shall be well brought up and have all the advantages that a free country can give them. This is why the arts flourish here, and why American engineers and American machinists are leading the world.—The Engineer.

And this, also, is why American industry and American workmen should not be taxed to death, but allowed a fair chance at the markets of the world, which are now in the clutches of nations which could not compete with America on an equal footing.

But the hands of the American workman are fettered. A high tariff wall compels American industry to prey upon itself, by keeping its products out of foreign markets, thus overstocking the home market the result, consequently, being depression reduction of wages, strikes, lockouts and all the ills that affect American labor.

Give the American workman but half a chance, and he will beat the world.—Register.

Among the most foolish things in the world are the efforts made by railroad companies to prevent the public from getting the news in cases of accidents, wrecks, and the like. If they could succeed in suppressing the facts in such cases entirely their object might be understood, but when the only result is to delay the information for a day or so, while all sorts of wild rumors are flying about in the meantime, it would take somebody smarter than the proverbial Philidelphia lawyer to explain what the railroad companies gain by it.—Ex.

Internal revenue statistics show that in the fiscal year 1887-8 tax was collected on 1,852,725,000 cigarrettes. In the year 1888-9 the number increased to 2,159,515,860—an increase of 288,788,260. Two cases of boy insanity are reported from New York city, within a week, resulting from excessive cigarette smoking. One made an unsuccessful attempt at suicide. Both were sent to an asylum.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON August, 9.—Assistant Postmaster General Clarkson's friends have never forgotten his aspirations to be Secretary of the Interior in the present cabinet. The story that is just now interesting everybody in Washington is believed to have originated with the afore-mentioned friends of Mr. Clarkson. It tells in elaborate details that Mr. Harrison having become convinced that it would never do to appoint Attorney General Milley to the vacant justiceship of the Supreme Court, and his being a New York man having settled Secretary Tracy's chances, had decided to appoint Secretary Noble to the vacancy. That would make a vacancy in the cabinet, which the story goes on to say, the President has not yet decided whether he will fill with Postmaster General Wanamaker and make Mr. Clarkson Postmaster General or appoint Mr. Clarkson Secretary of the Interior. A very pretty story and one that will have the intended effect of reminding President Harrison that Mr. Clarkson expects to go in the cabinet if a vacancy occurs. Secretary Noble denies that he is to be appointed to the Supreme Court. He ought to know it about as soon as anybody else.

No bills will be paid the telegraph companies for carrying government messages until it is decided at what rate they shall be paid for. The Post-master General insists that one mill per word is enough. This the telegraph people deny.

The Treasury department received by mail from the commander of the revenue cutter "Rush" full particulars of the seizure of the Canadian sealing vessel "Black Diamond" in Behrings sea, but declines to make it public until it is seen by Secretary Windom, who is at present out of town.

Next Winter, it is probable that about 11,000,000 acres of land in the great Sioux Indian reservation in Southern Dakota will be thrown open to settlement. It only requires that Congress shall approve the agreement, which Ex-Gov. Foster, chairman of the Commission, telegraphed the Interior department Wednesday had been made with the Indians. Under this agreement the Indians will receive $1.25 per acre for all the land sold during the first three years, 75 cents per acre for all that remains unsold after. The Commission, which was composed of Ex-Gov. Foster, of Ohio, Gen. Crook, U. S. A., and Hon. Wm. Warner, of Missouri, have been about a month in getting the requisite number of Indians—two thirds of the males over eighteen years old—to sign the agreement. The Indians refused to sign a similar agreement last year.

Representative Allen, of Miss., is in town. Speaking of the next House he said: "The republican programme will presumably be the revision of the rules and an attempt to seat republican contestants. I am not a democratic leader, but I believe that "the crimes they have taught us we should practice". If the republicans are allowed their way they will quickly produce a working majority. But remember how they postponed election cases in the last Congress. The Felton—Sullivan contest, for instance they would not allow to be considered at all. I, for one have no fear of the extra session. The burden of its mistakes will be on republican shoulders."

It has been decided that when the Civil Service Commission certify three names for appointment and one of them is a discharged soldier or sailor he must be selected by the appointing power for the place.

The employes of the Government Printing Office are working night and day to get the great mass of testimony in the contested election cases in print before Congress meets. There is an unusual number of such cases and a vast mass of evidence in each case. One of the cases just completed makes a book of nearly 500 pages.

Only one member of the administration is at present in Washington. Secretary Noble is the man. He is carrying the responsibility of the whole machine but it does not seem to warry him much, if any.

President Harrison glad the heart of many waiting and hungry brethren by making a large number of appointments before leaving for Bar Harbor. Still the number disappointed was much the greatest.

Attorney General Miller has gone to Indianapolis, where he will remain untill joined by the President on the 22nd, inst. at the laying of the corner stone of the soldiers monument, after which they will return to Washington together.

A stick of dynamite was fed in to a threshing machine in Ind. the other day. The machine was blown to pieces, three men were torn to atoms and two teams killed.

A Little Sermon

There is a great deal of talk in this day and time of culture. We hear of literary societies that meet to dispense views that are more or less rapid, we hear of schools of philosophy; we hear of the growth and accumulation, so to speak, of that free and easy doctrine which the Plunketts of the north call Christian science; and we hear of a thousand and one movements that restless and uneasy people are pushing forward under the cloak of culture and moral development.

It is a very easy matter to talk about culture and progress. We see a great deal about it in current books and read a great deal about it in newspapers, especially in newspapers printed in the neighborhood of Boston. But, after all, what is culture, and what are its benefits? It is easier to ask the question than it is to answer it, and this is because the average opinion of culture amounts to confusion.

To the person who is familiar with the best in literature—and this familiarity is cheaply and quickly bought—there is nothing to be less sought after than culture. The man who reads his Bible understandingly and appreciatively, and who makes a study of the wonderful body of literature that it contains, is more highly cultured than he who has read a hundred books in a dozen different languages.

Character is the essence of culture, and the books that form character and enable the mind to understand that information is not wisdom and that knowledge is not necessarily the result of what we are pleased to call education. What is best in life is to be found in the best of books—and this suggestion need not necessarily be construed into a sermon. St. Paul was a preacher, it is true, but he was a literary man also, and he had qualities which were not transmitted to the modern evangelists. So with Job and Isaiah, and so with the beloved prophet who was bold enough to ease his troubled soul in the pages of Ecclesiastes.

The only culture in life or in literature that is worth considering grows out of earnestness and simplicity.—Atlanta Constitution.

Statistics show that during the past year, there were 2,184 murders in the United States, against 87 legal executions and 144 lynchings.

THE FRONT GATE AJAR.

Her Father Raised His Chamber Window and This is What Came to Him Through the Summer Air.

"Purty night, ain't it, Tilly?"

"Yes, purty enough; good night, Hank."

"What's yer rush?"

"I'd say 'rush' if I were you."

"Why, we ain't been standing here but a few minutes."

"O-o-o-h, Hank Sparks, what a big story teller you are. We've been here over an hour."

"Well, what if we have?"

"Well, that's long enough, that's what. We'd ought to be 'shamed of ourselves anyhow."

"What for?"

"For being so silly."

"I reckon we ain't the only silly folks in the world then."

"That makes no difference. Good night."

"No, wait a minute, Tilly."

"What for? You s'pose I'm going to stand here all night?"

"Nobody wants you to say here all night, but I don't see why you snatch yourself away like this."

"Pa'll be calling me first thing I know."

"Let' im call; it won't hurt him."

"It might hurt you if he took a notion to come out or to set old Bose loose"

"Pooh! Who's afraid?"

"You'd better be. Good night."

"Wait a minute."

"I shan't stay out here another minute."

"Yes you will."

"I shan't. Let go my hands."

"I don't have to."

"You mean thing, you! I—I—if you dare to kiss me again, Hank Sparks!"

"Oh, I daren't, eh! There!"

"Hank Sparks!"

"There's another."

"I've a notion to call for pa. I will if you kiss me again, sir!"

"You're the worst case I ever saw. Shame on you!"

"Pooh! I pity a fellow who ain't grit enough to kiss his girl when he can."

"I'd be ashamed if I was you, sir. Good night."

"Good night, Tilly."

"Good night."

"Good night. Don't forgit that we're going to the singing school Friday night."

"Maybe we will and maybe we won't."

"You'd better look out or I'll kiss you again."

"Yes, you daresn't! Good night."

"Bye-bye."

"Goodby."

A man never knows what he can do until he tries, and then, after word, he is often very sorry that he found out.

Gentleman (calling at the house of a friend): "Is your mistress in?" Mary: "She is sir." Gentleman: "Is she engaged?" Mary: "Faith, she's more than that—she's married."

A man doesn't feel at least inflated when blown up by his wife.

Strange.—Husband: "I dreamt I died and went to heaven. Strange." Wife: "Yes strange indeed."

Miss Lovelorn: "Did you mean that as a smile at me? Oldbeau: "No, my dear; it was a twige of the rheumatism."

What is the difference between a summer dress and an extracted tooth?—One is too thin and other is tooth out.

Two heads are better than one. The two-headed freak in the dime museum earns a larger salary than the one-headed professor.

Bride: "George, dear, when we reach town let us try to avoid leaving the impression that we are newly married." "All right, Maud; you can lug this valise."

Madam: "Do up my hair, Felice, while I am down at breakfast." Felice: "Yes, madam; which colour?" Madam: "The black, please; I am going to a funeral."

A garrulous fop, who had annoyed by his frivolous remarks his partner in the ballroom, asked whether she had ever had her her ears pierced. "No, but I have had them bored."

Stout Lady: "Sir, I beg that you will desist from following me, or I shall call a constable." Perspiring Stranger: "Pray don't say so. It's the only bit of a shade in the whole park. I'd do as much for you, but my shadow isn't worth mentioning."

Adorer (nervously): "Isn't that your father's step on the stairs?" Sweet Girl: "Yes, but don't mind that; it's only a scare. He won't come down. He always stamps around that way when I sit up with young men after eleven o'clock."

An attorney at law, who wished to show his smartness by quizzing an old farmer, began by asking him if there were many girls in his neighborhood.

"Yes," replied the old man; "there's a dreadful sight of 'em—so many that there ain't half enough respectable husbands for 'em all, and so some of 'em are beginning to take us with lawyers!"

The attorney did not follow up the subject.

"Well, Master Jackson," said the minister, walking homeward after service with an industrious labourer, who was a constant attendant "Sunday must be a very blessed day of rest for you, who work so hard all the week. And you make good use of the day, for you are to be always seen at church." "Ay, sir," replied Jackson, "it is, indeed a blessed day, I works hard enough all the week, and then I comes to church o' Sundays, and sets me down, and lays my legs up and thinks o' nothin."

The Weight of Individuals.

The average weight of a boy at birth is seven and that of a girl a little more than six pounds. When they attain the full development of man or womanhood they should weigh twenty times as much as they did at birth. This would make a man's average weight 140 and a woman about 125. The height of a male at birth is 1 ft. 7 in., and that of a female 1 ft. 6 in. Fully grown a man's height should be about three and a half times greater than at birth, or 5 ft. 9 in., while a woman should be 5 ft. 5 in. The weight of individuals who are fully developed and well formed, however, varies within extremes, which are nearly as one to two, while the height varies within limits which at most are as 1 to 1.3d. Taking 300 lbs. as the maximum of man's weight and 60 as the minimum, we would have the average of [illegible] lbs. Placing the maximum weight of woman at 155 lbs. and the minimum at 59 lbs., and we get an average of 127½ lbs.

"I suppose you find this to be a hard, hard world, do you not?" she said, as she gave the tramp a loaf of stale bread. "Yes'm," answered the tramp, trying to make a dent in the loaf with his knife; "but we frequently strike things that are harder."

In the Sun.

A knowledge of feline traits once enabled Charles James Fox to win a wager from the then Prince of Wales, while the two were sauntering along a fashionable street in London.

It was a hot summer's day and Fox offered to bet that he would see more cats than His Royal Highness during their promenade, although the Prince might choose on which side of the street he would walk.

It turned out that Fox had seen thirteen cats and the Prince none.

"Your Royal Highness," said Fox, answering the Prince's request for an explanation, "choose of course, the shady side of the street as being most agreeable. I knew that the sunny side would be left for me, and that cats prefer the sunshine."—Youth's Companion.

BLACK CLOUD'S SON.

A GOVERNMENT RIDER'S STORY

There will never be another Indian outbreak serious enough to call for the action of a full regiment of soldiers in suppressing it. The extermination of the buffalo was the death-blow to the hostile Indian. Added to that, the building of the railroad lines flooded the West with emigrants, miners, hunters and tourist, and the Indian found himself hedged in by circumstances. The red man is no longer a warrior. He is down, and down pretty low, and it is the beginning of the end. He is doomed to follow the buffalo, and his total extinction will be regretted only by the few philanthropists who argued for him as a theory, and never came in physical contact.

No human being ever came nearer being a fiend than an Apache Indian. The Pawnees, Blackfeet and Cheyennes were wicked enough but the Apache had traits of his own—a fiendishness which other tribes might imitate but could not equal. He was born crafty and cruel. He never had the slightest feeling of mercy or pity from the cradle to the grave. He was never so much amused as when assisting to torture some living thing. He was never so satisfied as when planning to take life.

A year previous to the time General Custer was ordered West to begin a vigorous campaign against the Indians, the Apaches were in their glory, and they boasted that they could defeat any force of soldiers sent against them. I was scouting and mail-carrying in Texas for the Government, and after many close shaves was finanly captured by the red imps. It is of that incident I am going to write.

A month before my capture I was out on a scout on the Rio Pecos River, our party numbering eighteen men. We were well mounted and moving quickly from point to point. One day at noon we went into camp in a grove of cotton woods, and before I had unsaddled the Lieutenant in command informed me that he had lost his revolver from its holster during the last mile of our ride, and asked me to ride back in search. Instead of riding I returned on foot, and had the luck to find the weapon only about a quarter of a mile away. I then cut across an elbow to reach the grove, and when within stone's throw came suddenly upon an Indian pony in a dry gulch, and at the same instant discovered his owner crouched behind a boulder with his back to me and his face to the grove. I had him under my rifle before he could turn his head. Indeed, my finger was on the trigger when I saw that he was a boy. He had a rifle in his hands, but I called out to him to lay it down or I would fire, and after a moments hesitation he obeyed. Then, as I kept him covered at a distance of only seven or eight feet, I called to the men in the grove, and several of them came hurrying down in response.

I had captured a son of Black Cloud, Chief of one of the Apache bands, and the boy was named after his father. He was only fourteen years old, and his presence there exemplified the ruling traits of Apache character. Three hours before, he had discovered our party while out hunting with a party of his own. They dared not make an open attack, but the young Chief had sent his people away and then cut across the country to the grove, planning that we would halt there. Single handed and alone he was going to pick off the Lieutenant, and then make his escape to boast of it. We had splendid horses and were all old campaigners, and the boy would not have had one chance in ten to get away. He must have realized it, and yet he was willing to run the risks. He was greatly chagrined and cast down by his capture. We had finished our scout and were on our way back to Fort McKavett, and we determined to carry him in prisoner. When he was informed of this he earnestly begged me to kill him, saying that he could never hold up his head among his people again. Had he been wounded and rendered helpless it would not have been so bad; but to be taken as he was would forever disgrace him. We bound him fast to his pony, secured the animal against a break for liberty, and set out for the fort.

The boy was sullen and defiant for a time, refusing to answer any question, but after a while, when I had told him that he would not be harmed, and that his capture under the circumstances redounded to his credit, he thawed out a little. Three hours after his capture we got sight of a single Indian a mile away to our right on a knoll, and as we halted young Black Cloud informed me that it was one of his tribe, who wanted to have a talk with us. Signals were exchanged between the two, and the stranger soon came galloping in. He was one of the hunting party, and had been dodging us for twenty miles to find out if the boy had been captured. He was a fine looking fellow, and as he halted in our midst, and saw the ignoble situation of the boy his first thought was to fight for him. I called his attention to the fact that any move of his would result in the death of them both, and then explained how the youth was captured. Knowing the conceit of the tribe I spread it on very thick, alleging that it required our whole force to make the capture, and it was not accomplished then without a hard fight. This falsehood made the boy my friend for life, while it put the other in better humor. I stated that young Black Cloud would be taken to the fort and held prisoner until exchanged for some white captive, and gave my word that he would be well treated meanwhile. He sent a message to his father to the effect that he was not afraid, and hoped to be at liberty in a few days, and two hours later we had him safely lodged in the guard house at the fort. His capture was looked upon as a good thing, for we knew that his tribe would gladly exchange two or three white prisoners for him.

Two weeks after the capture of young Black Cloud I was called into the Colonel's office one evening, and asked if I thought it possible to get through to Fort Concho with despatches. The country was then in the possession of the hostiles. The Pecos warriors had come down out of New Mexico to make common cause against the whites, and the Kiowas, Cheyennes, Chickasaws, Seminoles, and Shawnees were all out in the country to the north and east. The Apaches had us almost in a state of siege, being seen every day within five miles of the post, and the chances of making a sixty-mile ride across the plains lying between the two forts without running against a party of hostiles was not one in fifty. At such periods our times a Government rider is not commanded to go. He is asked certain questions, however, in a manner which decides him to make the attempt. I left the post at 9 o'clock at night of an August evening perfectly satisfied that I should be dead or a prisoner before midnight. I had a bronco of tireless gait, a rifle and revolver, and I carried only five or six pounds extra weight. Before setting out I went in to see young Black Cloud and say good-by. I had spent much of my time in his company, and we had become pretty good friends. When I told him of my journey he took from his neck a buckskin string, to which was attached the tooth of a grizzly bear, and handed it to me with the remark:

"You cannot get through. You will be captured or killed. If not shot down, show this to my people. They will know who it belongs to. They may trade you for me, and I shall thus get back to my tribe."

A thunder storm was coming up as I took my departure. Instead of holding due north, on the direct route, I rode to the east for five miles and then held away for Concho direct. The storm now broke, and for a full hour I rode ahead at a steady gallop, one moment in darkness so black that I could not see the ears of my horse, and the next in a blaze of light so brilliant that it blinded me. By the time the storm had passed I was a good fifteen miles from the fort, and as I had seen nothing to alarm me I began to hope that I would get through all right. It was between 10 and 11 o'clock, and I had pulled my broncho down to a walk for the first time, when he suddenly uttered a snort of alarm and started off with wild jumps. Three or four rifles cracked, and as the reports reached me the horse fell in a heap and flung me far over his head. I was momentarily stunned by the fall, and before I had made a move to get up I was seized by at least three Indians, who were not a minute in binding my hands and feet. When I got a clear head once more it was to realize that the Apaches had me a secure prisoner, and that, there were six or seven warriors about me. The moon came up in a clear sky a little latter, and then I made out that I had run directly into a contemporary camp. The shots fired after me had brought down my horse, and he lay groaning and floundering a few yards away.

The Indians knew that I was a white man, but they didn't know who they had got hold of until morning came. During the interval I lay on the wet ground guarded by two of the warriors, and almost immediately after my capture two men were sent off in different directions with news of it. A party of twelve Apaches arrived just before daylight and ten more at sunrise, and among the latter I recognised Black Cloud, father of the boy. One of the men had recognised me as "The white-man-who-hurries," as the Government riders were called, and as being in the party who captured the Chief's son. No one ever saw such a mad lot of redskins before or since. They wanted to torture me, and yet they realized that through me the boy could obtain his liberty. The Chief at first declared that he had disowned his son, and that he might rot in confinement before he would exchange a white prisoner for him. When I called his attention to the charm young Black Cloud had given me the old man pretended to believe that it was a sign the boy was dead, and he ordered my immediate torture. I was jerked to a sitting position, my boot cut off, and the devils were about to use their knives on my feet when the old man changed his mind and restrained them. The sight of me before them was the same as a pail of fresh blood placed before ravenous wolves, and I expected to be knifed or tomahawked every moment for the first half hour. When they had cooled down a little Black Cloud demanded the particulars of his boy's capture. I saw that he felt degraded over the event, and was ready to disown the youth, and I made out a strong defence for the little chap to save my own scalp.

It was finanly decided to spare my life for a few days, and I was conducted to a camp in the foot-hills between the two forts. Here a council was held, and I had a close shave of it. While Black Cloud wanted his son back, some of his advisers contended that he should wait until securing some cheaper prisoner. They insisted on making me out a very important personage, and it was well known that I had killed or wounded several of the tribe in different scrimmages. Another thing that bothered them was how to make the exchange and not get [illegible]. Treacherous and deceitful to the last degree themselves, they would not credit the whites with having any honor. It was argued, too, that the commander of the fort would exchange the boy for a private soldier or any sort of prisoner, and that I had done them too much damage to be set at liberty. There were three days in which my fate was undecided, and during the last day a stake was driven and fagots collected for a fire to torture me. I had no voice in the council, being bound and under guard, but it was at length decided to make the exchange. So cautious and fearful were the Indians that it took a week to effect what might have been done in a day. I wrote a note to the commandant explaining the situation. This was carried in by a squaw, who was permitted to see and converse with young Black Cloud. He replied that he would exchange. The Apaches then wanted the boy turned loose before they released me, but this I would not hear to, knowing they would murder me. It was finally arranged that he was to be escorted a mile outside the fort and turned loose on his horse. I was to be taken to withig a mile of the fort, and turned loose on foot. The parties were to occupy eminences half a mile apart, and the hour was to be 9 o'clock in the morning. This plan was carried out. Twenty soldiers came out with the boy, and about the same number of Apaches escorted me. The treachery of the copper-faced fiends was soon exemplified. They had posted five warriors in a dry run to shoot me down as I made for the fort. The boy doubtless suspected some such move, for as soon as released he came galloping straight for me, and after a "how how" and a hand shake he insisted that I walk beside his pony until we reached the gate of the fort. When I was safe he waved his hand and rode away to be received with yells and cheers and it was then we saw the treacherous rascals creeping out of the cover where they had been stationed. A year later, after a fight in which over forty of the bravest Apache warriors had gone to earth I found young Black Cloud among the dead, having been hit four times. He had a Winchester and a revolver from which every cartridge had been fired.

Give American Labor a Chance.

First-class American work is not only the best of its kind in the world, but the output for a given plant is much greater. It is not the machines or the methods alone that accomplish this last, but the social status of the workman also. This is an inexplicable position to foreigners, who do not accord workingmen any social standing whatever, but it is a mighty fact here. American workmen do more work because they are more intelligent, and are a part of all they undertake; they have more at stake. They care little about the the quality of their beer, but very much about the houses they live in and the clothing they wear. Their great solicitude anxiety is that their children shall be well brought up and have all the advantages that a free country can give them. This is why the arts flourish here, and why American engineers and American machinists are leading the world.—The Engineer.

And this, also, is why American industry and American workmen should not be taxed to death, but allowed a fair chance at the markets of the world, which are now in the clutches of nations which could not compete with America on an equal footing.

But the hands of the American workman are fettered. A high tariff wall compels American industry to prey upon itself, by keeping its products out of foreign markets, thus overstocking the home market the result, consequently, being depression reduction of wages, strikes, lockouts and all the ills that affect American labor.

Give the American workman but half a chance, and he will beat the world.—Register.

Among the most foolish things in the world are the efforts made by railroad companies to prevent the public from getting the news in cases of accidents, wrecks, and the like. If they could succeed in suppressing the facts in each case entirely their object might be understood, but when the only result is to delay the information for a day or so, while all sorts of wild rumors are flying about in the meantime, it would take somebody smarter than the proverbial Philadelphia lawyer to explain what the railroad companies gain by it.—Ex.

According to a correspondent of the New York Evening Post, 3,160,000 bushels of peanuts are consumed in this country every year. They come chiefly from Virginia and North Carolina, although Tennessee also produces a small crop.

Statistics compiled by the Board of Inquiry, have ascertained that over six thousand people were killed in the Conemaugh Valley during the great lake burst.

On the 2nd inst. Lewis B. Short [illegible] was killed near Ronceverte by falling off of a freight train. He was beating his way from Hinton to Charlottesville Va.

New Yorkers are talking of building a tower 1,500 feet high.

The immigration during July was 3,874 less than in July, 1888. Every month this year has shown a gradual decline in European arrivals.

During a quarrel between Fred Ewing, white, and Jerome Crawford, colored, of Glenville, W. Va., the former stabbed the latter in the arm, inflicting severe injuries. Crawford's body was found on the roadside afterward with his head crushed in. Ewing is under arrest charged with the crime.

Congressman Wm. L. Wilson, of West Virginia, now in England, writes to a friend in Washington that he has attended a session of the House of Commons, and was not particularly impressed either by the speeches he heard or by the appearance of the hall, which, he says, is not as large as that of the United States House of Representatives.

"Brick" Pomery, the widely known author and editor, at 234 Broadway, New York, will, on receipt of 25 cents, send as directed, a sample copy of one of his interesting books entitled, Ourselves and our Neigybors: also a copy of his very independent and original monthly magazine, Advance Thought And you will read every line each contains.

Internal revenue statistics show that in the fiscal year 1887-8 tax was collected on 1,852,725,000 cigarrettes. In the year 1888-9 the number increased to 2,159,515,860—an increase of 288,788,260. Two cases of boy insanity are reported from New York city, within a week, resulting from excessive cigarette smoking. One made an unsuccessful attempt at suicide. Both were sent to an asylum.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON August, 9.—Assistant Postmaster General Clarkson's friends have never forgotten his aspirations to be Secretary of the Interior in the present cabinet. The story that is just now interesting everybody in Washington is believed to have originated with the afore-mentioned friends of Mr. Clarkson. It tells in elaborate details that Mr. Harrison having become convinced that it would never do to appoint Attorney General Milley to the vacant justiceship of the Supreme Court, and his being a New York man having settled Secrejary Tracy's chances, had decided to appoint Secretary Noble to the vacancy. That would make a vacancy in the cabinet, which the story goes on to say, the President has not yet decided whether he will fill with Postmaster General Wanamaker and make Mr. Clarkson Postmaster General or appoint Mr. Clarkson Secretary of the Interior. A very pretty story and one that will have the intended effect of reminding President Harrison that Mr. Clarkson expects to go in the cabinet if a vacancy occurs. Secretary Noble denies that he is to be appointed to the Supreme Court. He ought to know it about as soon as anybody else.

No bills will be paid the telegraph companies for carrying government messages until it is decided at what rate they shall be paid for. The Post-master General insists that one mill per word is enough. This the telegraph people deny.

The Treasury department received by mail from the commander of the revenue cutter "Rush" full particulars of the seizure of the Canadian sealing vessel "Black Diamond" in Behrings sea, but declines to make it public until it is seen by Secretary Windom, who is at present out of town.

Next Winter, it is probable that about 11,000,000 acres of land in the great Sioux Indian reservation in Southern Dakota will be thrown open to settlement. It only requires that Congress shall approve the agreement, which Ex-Gov. Foster, chairman of the Commission, telegraphed the Interior department Wednesday had been made with the Indians. Under this agreement the Indians will receive $1.25 per acre for all the land sold during the first three years, 75 cents per acre for all that remains unsold after. The Commisson, which was composed of Ex-Gov. Foster, of Ohio, Gen. Crook, U. S. A., and Hon. Wm. Warner, of Missouri, have been about a month in getting the requisite number of Indians—two thirds of the males over eighteen years old—to sign the agreement. The Indians refused to sign a similar agreement last year.

Representative Allen, of Miss., is in town. Speaking of the next House he said: "The republican programme will presumably be the revision of the rules and an attempt to seat republican contestants. I am not a democratic leader, but I believe that "the crimes they have taught us we should practice". If the republicans are allowed their way they will quickly produce a working majority. But remember how they postponed election cases in the last Congress. The Felton—Sullivan contest, for instance they would not allow to be considered at all. I, for one have no fear of the extra session. The burden of its mistakes will be on republican shoulders."

It has been decided that when the Civil Service Commission certify three names for appointment and one of them is a discharged soldier or sailor he must be selected by the appointing power for the place.

The employes of the Government Printing Office are working night and day to get the great mass of testimony in the contested election cases in print before Congress meets. There is an unusual number of such cases and a vast mass of evidence in each case. One of the cases just completed makes a book of nearly 500 pages.

Only one member of the administration is at present in Washington. Secretary Noble is the man. He is carrying the responsibility of the whole machine but it does not seem to warry him much, if any.

President Harrison glad the heart of many waiting and hungry brethren by making a large number of appointments before leaving for Bar Harbor. Still the number disappointed was much the greatest.

Attorney General Miller has gone to Indianapolis, where he will remain untill joined by the President on the 22nd, inst. at the laying of the corner stone of the soldiers monument, after which they will return to Washington together.

A stick of dynamite was fed in to a threshing machine in Ind. the other day. The machine was blown to pieces, three men were torn to atoms and two teams killed.

A Little Sermon.

There is a great deal of talk in this day and time of culture. We hear of literary societies that meet to dispense views that are more or less rapid, we hear of schools of philosophy; we hear of the growth and accumulation, so to speak, of that free and easy doctrine which the Plunketts of the north call Christian science; and we hear of a thousand and one movements that restless and uneasy people are pushing forward under the cloak of culture and moral development.

It is a very easy matter to talk about culture and progress. We see a great deal about it in current books and read a great deal about it in newspapers, especially in newspapers printed in the neighborhood of Boston. But, after all, what is culture, and what are its benefits? It is easier to ask the question than it is to answer it, and this is because the average opinion of culture amounts to confusion.

To the person who is familiar with the best in literature—and this familiarity is cheaply and quickly bought—there is nothing to be less sought after than culture. The man who reads his Bible understandingly and appreciatively, and who makes a study of the wonderful body of literature that it contains, is more highly cultured than he who has read a hundred books in a dozen different languages.

Character is the essence of culture, and the books that form character and enable the mind to understand that information is not wisdom and that knowledge is not necessarily the result of what we are pleased to call education. What is best in life is to be found in the best of books—and this suggestion need not necessarily be construed into a sermon. St. Paul was a preacher, it is true, but he was a literary man also, and he had qualities which were not transmitted to the modern evangelists. So with Job and Isaiah, and so with the beloved prophet who was bold enough to ease his troubled soul in the pages of Ecclesiastes.

The only culture in life or in literature that is worth considering grows out of earnestness and simplicity.—Atlanta Constitution.

Statistics show that during the past year, there were 2,184 murders in the United States, against 87 legal executions and 144 lynchings.

NOTICE.

The undersigned commissioners appointed at the July term of the County Court of Pocahontas, to rent the Infirmary or Poor farm in said county, will receive sealed bids until the 18th of September next, 10 o'clock, a. m. at which time the said bids will be opened. We reserve the right to reject any or all bids. The bids can be placed in the hands of either of the Com'rs. The time of renting will begin the 1st day of April, 1890 and expire April 1st 1893, subject to be annuled at any time for good cause appearing to the Court. The way for bidding is what amount the renter is willing to pay annually for the farm and the amount he will charge annually to receive and keep each Pauper to comfortably clothe and feed and take care of them.

The farming of the land must be done after the manner of the leading farmers in this country. The renter to have privilege of cultivating in crop [illegible] each year if there is that much farming land to use for that purpose. The renter to furnish Clover and Timothy seed to sow the land he crops down in grass, also to return the farm at the expiration of the rent with the fences in a good repair as when he receives it, except as to new rails. Madam: "Do up my hair, Felice, while I am down at breakfast." Felice: "Yes, madam; which colour?" Madam: "The black, please; I am going to a funeral."

A garrulous fop, who had annoyed by his frivolous remarks his part in the ballroom, asked whether she had ever had her her ears pierced. "No, but I have had them bored."

Stout Lady: "Sir, I beg that you will desist from following me, or I shall call a constable." Perspiring Stranger: "Pray don't say so. It's the only bit of a shade in the whole park. I'd do as much for you, but my shadow isn't worth mentioning."

Adorer (nervously): "Isn't that your father's step on the stairs?" Sweet Girl: "Yes, but don't mind that; it's only a scare. He won't come down. He always stamps around that way when I sit up with young men after eleven o'clock."

An attorney at law, who wished to show his smartness by quizzing an old farmer, began by asking him if there were many girls in his neighborhood.

"Yes," replied the old man; "there's a dreadful sight of 'em—so many that there ain't half enough respectable husbands for 'em all, and so some of em are beginning to take us with lawyers!"

The attorney did not follow up the subject.

"Well, Master Jackson," said the minister, walking homeward after service with an industrious labourer, who was a constant attendant "Sunday must be a very blessed day of rest for you, who work so hard all the week. And you make good use of the day, for you are to be always seen at church." "Ay, sir," replied Jackson, "it is, indeed, a blessed day, I works hard enough all the week, and then I comes to church o' Sundays, and sets me down, and lays my legs up and thinks o' nothin."

The Weight of Individuals.

The average weight of a boy at birth is seven and that of a girl a little more than six pounds. When they attain the full development of man or womanhood they should weigh twenty times as much as they did at birth. This would make a man's average weight 140 and a woman about 125. The height of a male at birth is 1 ft. 7 in., and that of a female 1 ft. 6 in. Fully grown a man's height should be about three and a half times greater than at birth, or 5 ft. 9 in., while a woman should be 5 ft. 3 in. The weight of individuals who are fully developed and well formed, however, varies within extremes, which are nearly as one to two, while their height varies within limits which at most are as 1 to 1.34. Taking 200 lbs. as the maximum of man's weight and 85 as the minimum, we would have the average of 142½ lbs. Placing the maximum weight of woman at 185 lbs. and the minimum at 70 lbs., and we get an average of 127½ lbs.

"I suppose you find this to be a hard, hard world, do you not?" she said, as she gave the tramp a loaf of stale bread. "Yes'm," answered the tramp, trying to make a dent in the loaf with his knife; "but we frequently strike things that are harder."

In the Sun.

A knowledge of feline traits once enabled Charles James Fox to win a wager from the then Prince of Wales, while the two were sauntering along a fashionable street in London.

It was a hot summer's day and Fox offered to bet that he would see more cats than His Royal Highness during their promenade, although the Prince might choose on which side of the street he would walk.

It turned out that Fox had seen thirteen cats and the Prince none.

"Your Royal Highness," said Fox, answering the Prince's request for an explanation, "choose of course, the shady side of the street as being most agreeable. I knew that the sunny side would be left for me, and that cats prefer the sunshine."—Youth's Companion.

New List of Don'ts.

Don't drink black or green tea. Paint it red.

Don't wear high heels, and yet do not walk altogether on your uppers.

Don't eat a large, juicy steak at a boarding house.

Don't wear your bathing-suit to a sleighing party.

Don't permit a boy to eat more than fifteen times a day if you can help it.

Don't eat on an empty stomach unless you feel hungry.

Don't read in street cars of jolting stages. Get the conductor to read to you.

Don't eat chicken salad if bob veal does not agree with you.

Don't lose your head in case of violent bleeding at the nose. You might need it in your business.

Don't eat cucumbers or stale meats. Send them to the preacher.

Don't eat shad in a hurry.

Don't drink liquor in large quanties when suffering with delirium tremens.

Don't jump from the window when suffering with alcoholism under the impression that there are snakes in the room. These serpents are more imaginative than real.

Don't sit with your back to a sight-draft.

The Steubenville Herald tells of a curious superstition that is observed in Jefferson county, Ohio on "turnip planting day." "The turnips, says the Herald, are sown before daylight by the head of the family walking backward through the field, clad in nothing but his shirt, and he must not speak to anyone before daylight comes. This may seem very foolish, but we will venture to say that four-fifths of the turnips in Jefferson county were sown yesterday, and that at least twenty farmers observed the walking backward shirt-tail arrangement."

It is indeed a curious custom, but there are objections to one feature of it; that requiring the head of the family to walk backward with nothing on but his shirt. Suppose, for instance, the head of the family happens to be a woman, does the requirement hold good?—Intelligencer, July 30.

Matt. Kramer, of Putnam county, W. Va., is over six feet high and weighs 285 pounds. He is claimed to be the strongest man in the world. A short time since he raised a huge pedestal weighing 2,300 pounds, held it above his head for several seconds, and then tossed it to the ground. His friends say he can thrash the "baked beans" out of the Boston slugger.

KISS HER AND TELL HER SO.

You've a neat little wife at home John,
As sweet as you'd wish to see;
As faithful and gentle-hearted,
As fond as wife can be;
A genuine, home-loving woman,
Not caring for fuss and show;
She's dearer to you than life, John;
Then kiss her and tell her so.

Your dinners are promptly served, John,
As likewise your breakfast and tea;
Your wardrobe is always in order,
With buttons where buttons should be
Her house is a cosy home nest, John,
A heaven of rest below;
You think she's a rare little treasure;
Then kiss her and tell her so.

She's a good wife and true to you, John,
Let fortune be foul or fair;
Of whatever comes to you, John,
She cheerfully bears her share;
You feel she's a brave, true helper,
And perhaps far more than you know
'Twill lighten her end of the load, John,
Just kiss her and tell her so.

There's a cross road somewhere in life John,
Where a hand on a guiding stone
Will signal one "over the river,"
And the other must go on alone.
Should she reach the last milestone first John
'Twill be comfort amid your woe
To know that while loving her here, John,
You kissed her and told her so.

The Basket Seller.

"Well, I declare!" said Mrs. Gibson, slowly and emphatically. "What will happen next? There was the eclipse a Wednesday night and the earthquake shock a week ago, and Jane Ann Shorey's run-away match with Phil Parkinson last night; and I swan to gracious if here don't come along Emma Ellis, ridin' on top of a load o' willer ware, jist for all the world as if she was a man!"

"Don't you want to buy a clothes basket, Mrs. Gibson?" called out Emma Ellis's clear soprano voice, as the sturdy sorrel pony came to a pause in front of the painted garden fence, where the young quinces were just beginning to assume shape and form among the downy, green leaves.

"A clothes-basket!" repeated Mrs. Gibson. "That's just exactly what I do want. Got any good substantial ones, with bars o' wood across the bottom to strengthen 'em?"

By way of answer, Emma Ellis swung down a solid-looking willow receptacle, springing after it herself, and a lively discussion ensued.

"Goin' into the peddlin' business, eh?" said Mrs. Gibson.

"Well, I thought I'd see how I liked it," Emma answered, with a cheery, good-humored laugh. "Do you like this basket? I've got some capital easy rockers for the old grandmother here, and a doll's cradle that will exactly suit the baby; and as for work baskets—"

And she made a triumphant motion of her hand that expressed marvels.

"Well, I'd like 'em all," said good Mr. Gibson, "but I don't feel able to buy nothin' but the basket this morning. Sellin' on commission eh?"

"No—out and out. Let me see; you want two dollars and nineteen cents change, do you?"

And Miss Ellis opened her flat leather pocketbook and counted out the money in true business-like fashion.

"Well—I—never!" repeated Mrs. Gibson, staring after the cloud of dust that followed the load of willow ware in its progress down the street.

"Why, what is the matter?" said Charles Borden, who had just stopped at the gate to see if he could borrow Farmer Gibson's mowing machine for the morrow.

"It's Emma Ellis," said Mrs. Gibson, "drivin' a load o' willer-ware, and sellin' baskets and hampers and things."

"Nonsense!" cried Borden.

"I jest bought this 'ere clothes basket of her!" declared Mrs. Gibson. "I tell ye what, Charley Borden, she's been disappointed in the deestrick school, and the squire he must have come plumb up agin a snag in the marble-mantel business, and as sure as you live Emma's got to earn her own livin'," with all them genteel ways and piano lessons and crayon picters, o' hern. My! what a come-down it is for that family! I don't see how Emma can be so chirk about it. Where's that Borden fellow?" she cried, staring about her. "Gracious me, if he ain't cut across the medder! I guess most likely he's seen Gibson there."

And Mrs. Gibson tied on a green-checked sun-bonnet and ran down the street to Mrs. Dalrymple to tell the news.

"Serves 'em right!" said Mrs. Dalrymple. "A fambly o' reg'lar goin' upstarts! I never did take no stock in Emma Ellis."

"Your son Oliver did though," chuckled Mrs. Gibson, with a meaning glance.

"That ain't neither here nor there," said Mrs. Dalrymple, sharply. "Oliver ain't goin' to squander on no girl the money that his father laid up, unless she's a real savin', hard workin' 'creetur', as will know how to take care of it."

"There she is now!" said Mrs. Gibson. "Stoppin' here!"

"No-o-o!" bawled Mrs. Dalrymple, opening the window a mere crack. "We don't want nothin." No, I say!"

Emma Ellis smiled to herself as she drove on, stopping next at the Borden farmstead, where, strange as it may appear, Borden himself had already arrived, by means of the short-cut across the Gibson meadows.

"Oh, is it you, Mr. Borden?" she asked, carelessly. "Won't you ask your sister if she requires anything in my way this morning?"

"But, Miss Ellis, what does this mean?" exclaimed the amazed young farmer.

"It means—willow-ware," Emma answered, composedly.

"Has anything happened?"

"Things are always happening," said Emma, reaching across the load for a particularly pretty market basket. "I think she will like this, Mr. Borden."

"I'll buy it for her," said Charley, reckle sly.

"And a scrap basket, shaped like a little barrel, don't you see," persisted Emma, "for your own room?" It's cheap—only a dollar."

"I'll buy that, too," said Charles Borden. "And this hamper and this pair of little baskets for Kate's boys to go blackberrying with, and—"

"Oh, stop, stop," merrily cried Emma. "You mustn't buy all my stock in trade, or I shall have nothing left for anybody else."

"Oh, but I really want that big rocker for the front porch," persisted Mr. Borden. "That's a necessity."

"The big rocker, then," said Emma, half laughing; "but beyond that, absolutely nothing more."

"But you'll promise me one thing?"

"It depends very much upon what it is."

"If you have anything left [illegible] at the end of your trip, you'll give me a chance?" said Charlie imploringly. "Wicker goods always come handy, you know."

Emma only laughed and touched up the old horse.

"I make no promise," said she.

That day, on the high seat among the baskets and rockers, the wash-tubs and clothes-horses, to Emma Ellis it was quite a new experience. The chaffering at shady farmhouse doors with busy housewives, the counting of change, the discussion of qualities and the persistent standing up against the general disposition to beat down prices and haggle for odd cents, the various views of human life which she now obtained for the first time from her aerial perch, the odd sensation of being "in trade," the consciousness that she was looked upon with pity by some of her friends and scorn by others—it was altogether a a strange conglomeration of feelings.

Toward the close of the day's work, as she was returning home with her wagon-load considerably depleted, and her purse somewhat better furnished than it had been, she chanced to come face to face with handsome Oliver Dalrymple, trotting along on the Morgan mare, which once had been the pride of the elder Dalrymple's heart. She looked him full in the face. He seemed absorbed in the knot on the end of his whip-lash, and never even looked her way.

"So!" she said to herself; "sets the wind that way?" Mr. Dalrymple does not seem to approve of this new enterprise of mine. Well, I'm sorry, but I can't help it. Charley Borden, now, views things in an entirely different way."

And she smiled a little as she saw, leaning anxiously over the gate beyond, the stalwart figure of the young farmer.

"Miss Ellis!" he uttered pleadingly.

"I'm sure you can't want to buy any more willow ware," said Emma, checking her horse. "There can't be room for it in the house."

"No; but won't you let me put this horse in the stable, or drive it home for you, while you come into tea? Allice will be delighted to see you. And you must be tired?" urged he.

Emma thought a moment, and as she reflected how refreshing a cup of hot tea would be, Alice Borden put her curly head out of the window.

"Do come, Emma!" she cried. "We'll have waffles and maple syrup and broiled chickens; and I've got ever so many things to tell you."

And Emma capitulated.

But as Charley Borden helped her down from her high seat, he stood a minute holding both her hands in his.

"Emma," said he, "I know I've no business to speak so abruptly, but I can't help it. I don't know why you are doing this thing, but if it is to earn money, let me earn it for you, Emma—give me the right to do it. I'm only a farmer, but I've got a nice place here, and I can keep you like a lady. And I love you, Emma! I've loved you well and truly this many and many a day. Now I'm not going to tease and bother you about this. Take time to make up your mind. I'll drive the old horse home, and then I'd take you back myself in the little buggy when you and Alice have had a good visit. And you can give me my answer when you please, and not before."

Emma broke from him and ran into the house, blushing yet not displeased.

Alice met her at the door.

"Where is Charley?" said she. "Oh, going to take your load of willow-ware home? Now, Emma, tell me what this really means. Have you lost all your property?"

"No."

"Are you going into trade?"

"No."

"You won't answer me?"

"No."

"Then", laughed Alice Borden, "I'll ask you no more questions. Hereafter I'm as dumb as an oyster. Now come in and help me dish up the chickens and waffles."

It was past eleven that night when Charley Borden brought Emma Ellis home to the old house, where the squire was nodding over his evening paper.

"Well," said he, viewing her over the edge of his spectacles, with a waggish twinkle in his clear blue eyes, "how did the thing work?"

"First rate, papa," said Emma. "I sold twenty dollars worth—within a few cents. And Mr. Borden here was one of my best customers."

"Then," said the squire, with a sigh of comic resignation. "I've lost my wager. You see, Borden, my girl wanted me to buy this stock of willow ware, with the horse and wagon, to set old Miss Barhydt up in business—and I told her no woman would succeed in such an enterprise, let alone their being unwilling to undertake this sort of work. But Emma stuck to it that it could be done, and I was weak enough to wager the whole outfit that it couldn't. So Emma declared she would prove it practically—and I didn't think she had pluck enough; but, by jingo, she has! Yes, yes, Emma, you've beat me square and fair!"

"And Miss Barhydt is to have the outfit of willow-ware!" cried Emma, joyfully, clapping her hands, "and the horse and wagon. Oh, Mr. Borden, you can't think what a nice old woman she is, nor how anxious she is to earn a livelihood in the open air like this! And now you know," with the archest and most bewitching of glances, "how it came to pass that I was peddling willow baskets around the country. Wouldn't you have done it, if you had been me?"

Young Dalrymple was in despair when he learned of Charles Borden's engagement to the prettiest girl—aye, and the richest girl—in the country.

"But who was to suppose," said he, "that she would take such an unaccountable whim into her head?"

And Mrs. Gibson always declared that she never had a clothes basket wear like the one she bought of Squire Ellis' daughter!

The editor of Wise county, Texas is fat, ragged and saucy, and deserves success. Here is what he says:

We love to live to eat and eat to live. Bring us a quarter's worth of peas, peaches, pears, plums, peanuts, polecats and possums and the best paper for thirteen weeks. We will accept butter, beans, eggs, chickens (if fully hatched), and any other digestible vegetables or fruits. We eat anything except catfish and grindstones.

Five men are to be executed August 23rd in New York city.

A shock of earthquake was felt in the Adirondack mountains in N. Y. on the 10 inst.

The Democrats of Virginia have, undoubtedly nominated their strongest candidate for Governor, Capt. W. P. McKinney. Mahoneism backed by the present administration will bring out the full democratic vote, and Democratic victory is an assured fact.

Four Distinguished Brothers.

The shooting in California last week of Judge Terry after slapping of the face a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, serves to remind us that Justice Field is one of four brothers, each of whom is a distinguished man. David Dudley Field the eldest, is best known as the author of the New York State Penal Code; Henry M. is the editor of the the Evangelist; and Cyrus W. will go down to history as the man who laid the first Atlantic cable. Their varied achievements it would manifestly be impossible to recount in such a short space as this. They each obtained success, honor, and wealth, though we can safely say that neither has enshrined himself in the hearts of his countrymen.

The North and the Negro.

Something has already been said in these columns about the refusal of all the barbers in Auburn, New York, to shave a respectable colored preacher.

Auburn gave a thousand majority for Harrison, and the people there doubtless think it a very good thing to force the negro into social equality down south, but they will have none of it themselves. The preacher in question offered a dollar for a shave, but he had a black skin, and that was enough for the barbers of this republican city.

This is nothing new. The north has always been prejudiced against the negro, unless he was at a distance. Sometimes this prejudice has found expression in acts of violence. In 1681 a negro woman was burned at the stake in Massachusetts, and in 1755 another shared the same fate. In 1741 fourteen negroes suspected of being engaged in a plot to burn the city of New York were publicly burned alive. The panic spread, and before it was over two more negroes were burned at Hackensack, New Jersey. In 1836 a negro was burned at St. Louis for killing a white man, and when the next grand jury met the judge said in his charge that it was a case "not of numerable and ascertainable malefactors, but of congregated thousands, seized by a [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] frenzy."

These instances are mentioned by the New York Evening Post, a journal which has on its staff Wendell Phillips Garrison, a son of William Lloyd Garrison, the great abolition agitator. The Post, therefore, is pretty good authority.

Is it likely that a people who burned negroes by wholesale a few generations ago are now entirely devoid of the same feeling of race hostility? It may slumber, but it is [illegible] there, and occasionally it [illegible] out. [illegible] the north forces the negro out of his proper sphere in the south she is simply making [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]. There is all there is in it.—Atlanta Constitution.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON August, 16—Representative Tom Reed, of Maine, will be the next Speaker of the House, of Representatives, at least that is what I have just been told by a prominent republican who is usually well posted on the inside news of his party. He says that the coolness which has existed between Blaine and Reed for several years has been all fixed up and that Blaine's influence will be thrown for him. This he says, was brought about by Quay, Clarkson and other leaders in the party, who have decided that Reed is the only one of the candidates for the speakership whose partizanship is strong enough to make him decide in favor of his party on every contested occasion, and owing to the narrow majority they will have in the House only such a man will fill the bill. Therefore it has been decided that the caucus should nominate Reed.

Congressman "Sunset" Cox is in this city whiling the time away telling miraculous stories of what he saw during his recent visit to the northwest.

It is now stated that the report of the Commission engaged in investigating the Pension office will be ready about September 1. It is also said that this report will determine whether Commissioner Tanner will continue in office or not.

It is remarkable how quick foreigners "catch on" to the American way of doing things. The French cook who was recently discharged from the White House, and who for several days had the papers full of an intended suit to be brought against the President for breach of contract, now says that she never had any idea of bringing any such suit, but as she and her husband are about to open a boarding house in this city she thought it would be a good idea to get some free advertising in the newspapers. She believed it would pay. Smart woman.

Another Washington girl has married a full blooded Indian. The girl went to Versailles N. Y., the other day, and the next thing her parents heard was that she had been married to Nathaniel Patterson, a Seneca Indian, who is a farmer near that place. There no accounting for taste.

The relic crank is abroad in the land. The latest freak of one who lives in this city is to exhibit the scaffold upon which John Brown was hung. He says he will use the money received to build a monument to the memory of Brown. If everybody was of the same mind as your correspondent it would take him a life time to get enough to buy a pine board.

The Indian bureau has sent a circular to applicants for teacher's positions in the Indians schools, informing them that no person will be appointed who has not the ability to stand the examination required to secure a similar position in the best schools for white children. If this bureau lives up to the circulars it has of late been sending out the scandals in the Indian service are likely to be fewer.

Contested Congressional election cases come rather high, but it seems we are bound to have them. Over ten thousand pages of testimony have been printed relating to those of the next House. It's dollars to little apples that we would not have one tenth of the contests, if the contestant had to foot the bills himself. The present methods offer a premium to the contestant.

The Postmaster-General has decided that the telegraph companies must accept the old rate of one cent per word for Government messages pending a settlement of the dispute. The telegraph people have not yet been heard from.

It has been decided by the Treasury department that the four new states can have no part of the $600,000 appropriated by the last Congress for establishing experimental agricultural stations in the different states.

The democratic state ticket just nominated at Richmond is enthusiastically received by Virginia democrats here. They say it removes the last vestige of doubt as to the result of the campaign.

The Inter-state commerce commission wants to know all about the organizations of railway employes for insurance and other purposes, and has sent a circular letter to railroad managers asking for information.

President Harrison has returned from Bar Harbor looking well. He leaves for Indianapolis next week to take part in the reunion of his old regiment and in the laying of the corner stone of the soldiers monument. It will be his first visit home since he has been President and he will probably remain there several days.

Two thousand houses were flooded in Lincoln, Neb., on the 14th inst in which a few drowning were reported and immense damage was done to property;

And let us not omit, that our inner man was fed intemperately by the hospitality of those kind people.

Thanks.

Mr. Editor: Allow us through the medium of your paper, to return our heart-felt thanks, to the people of this section, for their many deeds of great kindness, and their warm and tender sympathy in our time of affliction.

The Lynching—A Verdict.

The Coroner's jury, which has been in session all told seven days investigating the hanging of John Carter, colored, on the 22nd of last month, adjourned yesterday, after agreeing to the following verdict:

"The jury, upon their oath, do say that the said John Carter came to his death from hanging on the morning of the 22nd of July, 1889, before daylight, and that he was taken from the jail of Greenbrier county about 4 o'clock that morning by a mob of ten or twelve men and hung on a tree about one mile from Lewisburg, near the road leading from Lewisburg to Ronceverte in Greenbrier county, by the said mob that took him from said jail, and that Chas. E. White, Thomas Patterson, Harry Bowers, James Pinson, and one Glass of Hinton, Summers county, W. Va., whose christian name is unknown to the jury, and six or seven other men whose names are also to the jury unknown, composed the said mob and unlawfully and feloniously hung the said John Carter as aforesaid until he was dead." [Signed by the jury.]—Independent, Aug. 15th.

Ex-Judge David S. Terry slapped Justice Stephen J. Field's face in a railroad restaurant at Lathrop, Cal., and was shot dead by Deputy United States Marshall Nagle. Sarah Althea Hill-Terry was with her husband, though not in the room when the shooting took place.

The American Boy.

J. T. Trowbridge, in an article in the North American Review, both criticises and praises the American boy—criticises his irreverence and disobedience, praises his conscientiousness and generosity when these qualities are appealed to in a way to bring them out. To illustrate he tells too clever stories which he says are true. The first illustrates disobedience and disrespect, and shows how American parents are apt to encourage them. It is 'Sunday evening,' and a western farmer 'is smoking his pipe on the back porch, while young Josh, his namesake and heir, is playing with the dog in the yard. Old Josh takes dis pipe out of his mouth and remarks that it is time for young Josh to go for the cows.

The junior makes no reply, but keeps on teaching Congo to give his paw. Then the senior repeats his observation, to which he manages to give a little more of the tone of a command.

"'I tell ye, Josh, ye must go for the cows.'

"'I do' wonter,' grumbles young Josh.

"'Quit yer foolin' an' go along!' says old Josh.

"'I shant,' snarls back the junior.

"'I tell you to go, exclaims the elder.

"'I tell you I won't,' mutters the boy.

"'Wal, never mind,' says the father; 'mebby they'll come home.'"

The other story gives a more agreeable picture. It must be said however, that this boy was only six years old. What he would develop into can only be surmised. 'He had a cake,' says Mr. Trowbridge, 'a portion of which his cousin Minnie coveted. She accordingly reminded him, as she was fond of doing when she had a point to gain, of what 'the Bible says' about doing to others as we would be done by. 'Now you know Willie, if I had the cake you would want half of it. Willie hesitated a moment between inclination and a conviction of duty, and then said honestly: 'I should want all of it.' With tears in his eyes, but resolutely choking down his grief, he handed over to her the entire cake, which she walked off complacently nibbling.'

Wealthy Women in Plain Attire.

Some of the richest women are the least extravagant in their clothes, as is the case, for example with old Mrs. W. H. Vanderbilt, who does not spend above $1000 a year, and the late Mrs. Gould not so much. Nelly Gould, who will inherit $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 and already has income of $40,000 a year, spends about $2,500 in dress. The late Mrs. A. T. Stewart was a fortune to the dressmakers, who got ... $6,000 or $10,000 a year at her ... When she died and an inventory of her effects was taken her great white mausoleum of a house on 5th avenue was found to be overrun with the most marvelous amount of clothes, laces, furs, bonnets and jewels, most of them very youthful in appearance, though she was over seventy years of age. Mrs. Astor dresses with a solemn, handsome expensiveness at the cost of $4,000 or $5,000 a year, and and all of the younger Vanderbilt women spend a great deal of money on their clothes. Mrs. George Gould, who was Edith Kingdom, the actress, and who has been the quietest and most careful woman since her marriage, spends money like water when it comes to a question of clothes, and must put a good $10,000 a year in the hands of the dressmakers. Her dressmaker, by the way, is a woman who had a good deal of social position, but who, when financial misfortunes came, followed the example English women of rank have set of late years, and went into the milliner's business.

You Ought to Know.

That incivility does not pass for social superiority, even among the blind.

That nowadays you can tell a "gentleman" just as soon as he looms in sight.

That when men have to pay cash for a "vindication" they are worth watching.

That a frog in a thunder storm does not look as silly as the average "chappie."

That half the carriages seen in the park are either hired or not yet paid for.

That fashionable mourning nowadays does not always last as long as the crape.

That juries do not appear to be as much in sympathy with women as they were.

That genteel people are disgusted to hear the slang so many "society girls" use.

That the pomposity of a coachman is not lessened when his wages are overdue.

That education is better that fine clothes, abundant money, and laundry ancestors.

That there is a strong prejudice growing against the "shamefully re-married people."

That there are no feuds quite so mean as those in which "young ladies" are engaged.

That mothers ambitious for their daughters often forget the G. W. hatchet story.

That the labor of attending to other people's affairs is always voluntarily performed.

That the standard of business honor in Wall street isn't as high as the Eiffel tower.

That the superfluously athletic clergyman does not command the respect due his cloth.

That it is as much as a woman's good name is worth to belong to the "fast set" of to-day.

That too many rich men believe that they can take their money with them when they die.

That it is no wonder that the wives of some "society men" prefer the society of a pet dog.

That we need more rigid laws governing funerals of those who die of contagious diseases.

If "brevity is the soul of wit," dwarfs should be the funniest of men.

The best reasons.—Balkley—What's the matter, deah boy? Why don't you sit down? Calkley—Cawn't, you know. Got on a standing collah.

Talk of the scarcity of husbands! exclaimed Miss Longuate, throwing down the paper in vexation: I rather think the real trouble is the scarcity of single gentlemen.

Dude—Why is it that every clown has such a stupid face? Is he obliged to look stupid? Clown—Certainly. If I had your face my salary would be doubled at once.

At A Church Fair.

"Oh, Mr. Blank, you're the very man I'm looking for. You must take at least ten chances in the drawing for the crazy quilt. It's only twenty-five cents a chance, and——"

"Oh, Mr. Blank, you must give me fifteen cents and then guess how many beans there are in this jar, and if you guess——"

"There, Mr. Blank, isn't that a lovely bouquet in your buttonhole? A dollar, please."

"Aha, I've found you at last, Mr. Blank! We're voting an afghan to the prettiest young lady here, and you must put in at least twenty-five votes for Miss Brassy. It's only ten cents a vote, and——"

"Ah, Mr. Blank, I just know you want this smoking cap and jacket. They're only twenty-nine dollars, and——"

"Now, Mr. Blank, you're not gogoing by my table without buying something! Here's the very penwiper you desire, and it's only a dollar. There it is all done up nicely for you. What's this—a five dollar bill? Aoa, you foolish man! We never give any change at this table. Ha,ha, ha!"

"Oh, but you must buy this cigar case, Mr. Blank, I won't let you say no. Here it is. There! I've slipped it in your overcoat pocket. Four dollars, please."

"Oh, you bad, naughty man to try to go by my table when I've the very pair of slippers you've been longing for all these years. You're ever and ever so wicked! Wait until I do the slippers up in this lovely tissue paper, and——"

"Oh, Mr. Blank, have you seen Rebecca at the well, and the gypsy fortune-teller? Come, and I'll take you to them, and——"

"Stop, stop, Mr. Blank, not a step further until you've paid your quarter for a chance in the grab-bag!"

"Why, Mr. Blank, I'm so glad I ran across you. I want you to take six of the loveliest old ladies down stairs and get them oysters and ice cream. Oh, you shan't say no, I just won't let you!"

When Blank finally escapes by sneaking down cellar and out through the furnace room he walks three miles to his boarding place, because he hasn't a car fare left out of the fifty dollars he left home with.

He Knew the Signs.

When Mr. Spooner went home the other evening the door unexpectedly flew open while he was fumbling in his pocket for his latch key, and Mrs. Spooner had her arms around his neck and had given him a kiss on either cheek; then she said cheerily:

"Let me help you off with your overcoat dear. There, I'll hang it up, dear. You'll find your slippers by your chair and I'll put your shoes away. Did you have a good day down town, dear? You look tired. Poor, dear, old boy! There never was a woman who had a dearer husband than my dear, old George, anyhow! Sit right down, dear. There, there, darling, I'll get the evening paper for you. You just sit still and rest while I tell you about what a naughty little wife I've been to-day, for, oh, George, I got me the loveliest bonnet for only $19 and—and—you won't mind, will you, dear? I know you won't. That's a darling! It's so lovely! I'll run right up and get it and show it to you before tea!"

"Humph!" growled George, like the wretch he was, "I knew there was something of that sort coming. I know the signs!"

Make way here, gentlemen, said the officious policeman, clubbing the crowd right and left. We've got to have more room. There's an Englishman coming with a pair of new trousers on.

A DREAM IN DOGDAYS.

The following was written and read before the Teachers' Institute last week by Miss Lula M. Burner, of Green Bank, W. Va.

Not very long since, as I sat by a spring,
Surrounded by forests, where merry birds sing;
My thoughts were of places, of pleasure and mirth,
Of scenes of delight, in this land of my birth.

Do you wonder, dear friends, as thus I sat mute,
My mind flew away to our dear Institue;
Well, wonder or not, it is all very true,
What I will endeavor to make known to you.

I thought of this hour, and wondered if I
Should shine as a spark in the glittering sky;
But when I considered how small I'd appear,
I shrank from the thought with something like fear.

Then the spring at my feet, seemed calling to me,
To note its small strength, yet it sped to the sea;
This set me to thinking, that, however small,
My help might be needed to roll the great ball.

An infallible teacher, I then, wished to see,
That such a one's rules, my own rules should be;
While thus I sat thinking, to dreaming I fell,
And how long continued, I really can't tell.

A lady approached me, and calling my name,
Said, "Follow me, I am a lady of fame."
"What's your name, and your mission, dear lady, tell me?"
But for once, she was silent, or tried hard to be.

Though, I found out her name, it matters not how,
It was rather ill fame, it was "Tattler," I vow,
At length to her mission, by querying I lit,
She was going to a teacher's assembly to-wit.

This was an occasion that suited my plans,
To meet with the wise, who would lend helping hands.
So with her I started, these dear ones to meet,
But some questions must ask 'ere I know who to greet,

First, I asked her if A. would be one I could trust,
To instruct me; but "Oh!" she replied, with disgust,
"Dear me, he is lazy and puffed up with pride,
And the poorest of children I think he'd deride.
And I'm told that he teaches alone for the dimes,
But sits quietly reading the POCAHONTAS TIMES.
The board says he's careless, and I've understood
He seldom, if ever, fills the stove up with wood.
The school-house is cold, and from Edward to Dick,
Poor dears, I am told, were every one sick."

I then wished to know, what she knew about B.,
If 'twould be worth my while this person to see.
"Nay he bids not adieus, when the children go out,
Nor hails them, good morning, the lazy old lout,
At play-time the children don't play on the green,
But scuffle and swear and do everything mean,
And when they are quarreling he chides with a grin,
But for fear of much trouble he quickly goes in."

When next I appealed to her knowledge for skill,
'Twas of a dear lady of whom I thought well,
But she quickly made answer, "Miss Prudence is wise,
Keeps very good order, seems knowledge to prize,
But see there's extremes, both ways dear," said she,
"She makes them write essays, or punished they'll be,
Now this is too much for children to do,
She ought to know better, now, say what think you?"

Of course I said nothing about her just then,
But spoke of another, the best among ten.
"Well, she is a lady, she's timid and careless,
She could not subdue large boys like ours.
Besides she's too young, should be playing with boys,
And the first thing we know, she'll be courting our boys."

"Now there's Mr. W., from Highland, he came,
Is he not a teacher of excellent name.
Would I meet with success if I patterned his ways?"
To this she made answer, and seemed much amazed.
"He reads not the scriptures, though laws of our State
Are very decided, and should have their weight.
He holds to no church, so all of them tell,
Is thoughtless and foppish and cuts quite a swell."

"Well there's Mr. Pious, Oh, how does he please?
For he reads the scriptures and prays on his knees,"
But here she made answer and went in a fit,
"Don't mention his name, he's an old hypocrite!"

"Well tell me my faults, you have told all the rest,
What are the failings of which I'm possessed?"
To this she made answer, "Now I am your friend,
Will speak of your faults so you may amend,
They say you're as poor as the poorest church mouse,
The cottage you live in is scarce called a house,
Your rules are quite faulty, and stinted your knowledge,
But the greatest objection you've ne'er been to college."

As thus she was talking, I found that her game,
Was just to give teachers an excellent name;
So I said I'd return, I was a dependant,
Would seek for instruction, our Superintendant;
I knew he was faultless, could help me along,
But again she commenced her detestable song,
"His business to visit the schools seems to be,
But he doesn't do it, or, so they tell me."

My mind was perplexed, seeing trouble in store,
Resolving to hear busy, "Tattler," no more,
I left her behind, made a hasty retreat,
And hoped that a wiser one next I might meet;
Not far had I traveled when my ravished eyes
Beheld a dear object just ... from the skies,
With love in her heart and wisdom in head,
"I will ever assist you with counsel," she said,
"Don't listen to all that is said of you here,
On the River of Life your own vessel steer,
Love the land of your birth while now in your youth,
Love God and his creatures, love virtue and truth,
Your pupils instruct, while they seem inclined,
But punish the same if rebellious you find.
Your heart must be touched with the finger of love,
Your aim in this life to lead others above,
Fear not the ill name your conduct may bring,
But trust the result to our Heavenly King."

Such was the instruction she tendered to me,
While I wondered much, what her dear name could be;
I asked her her name, when lo! in the skies
She vanished, and straightway I opened my eyes.
As homeward I went toward the sun's setting rays,
I resolved I would profit by the dream of the day.

JUSTLY PUNISHED.

BY THOMAS BURKE.

James Monroe and Mary Murdock were engaged to be married. They had known each other for years and their parents were fast friends and near neighbors it seemed the most natural thing in the world that they should wed. They were the children of farmers and from school days up had attended the country merry makings together. No "husking" or "paring bee" or "mite society" was complete unless James and Mary were there.

James Monroe was a tall, blue-eyed young man of five and twenty, with light hair and a light moustache, which latter all the girls voted, "just too cute, for anything." As a truthful chronicler, we must add he was quite conceited and rather inclined to flirt.

Mary Murdock was a brunette, a charming little black-eyed miss who, though generally light hearted, gay and laughing, had more than once shown that it was hardly safe to trespass too far upon her good nature. Her age was twenty.

One evening in July there was an ice cream festival in Payne's Wood's near the village of Barnesville and also near the homes of the two betrothed lovers, and, of course, they were in attendance. It was a merry gathering. Besides ice cream cake, candy, peanuts and lemonade were offered for sale, all for the benefit of the church.

The merry making was at its height when a sudden hush fell on the assemblage and all eyes were riveted on a gentleman and lady who were slowly making their way towark the head dispenser of ice cream. The gentleman was bowing right and left, and smiling with great urbanity, thereby displaying a white and glistening set of false teeth to much advantage. Evidently he was on the best of terms with himself, and as a natural consequence with all the world. Why shouldn't Josiah Hurtom, J. P., the wealthiest man in the neighborhood be on good terms with himself.

But it was the young lady who attracted the lion's share of attention. She was, perhaps, twenty-five years of age, very tall, with dark blue eyes, and hair denominated auburn by her friends, and red by her enemies, of which last it may be said she had her full complement. Her form was simply perfection. When I add that she was rich in her own right, and the prospective heiress to another large fortune, I have, perhaps, said enough to convince the reader that her lines had fallen in very pleasant places. Her name was Imogene Hurton, and she was on a visit to her uncle, Squire Hurtom. She had tired of Saratoga, she had tired of Newport, the White Mountains, and Bar Harbor and therefore in a sudden freak had left the latter place for Barnesville, arriving there just in time for the lawn festival.

After gazing with some degree of interest on the, to her, unusual and amusing scene, she seated herself at a small table to partake of the cream and cake her uncle had provided.

She had just daintly raised the spoon to her lips when a blonde young man deposited a glass of lemonade in her lap and fell prone upon the grass at her side.

It was James Monroe who had been drafted in as a waiter for a short period and who had unluckily stumbled over a chair standing in the shadow of a tree.

Of course Miss Barton was angry, not that her splendid satin dress was irretrievably ruined, but at the awkardness of the whole affair. To have a young man fling a glass of lemonade on her dress and then fall at her feet if sueing for pardon or her hand, and that too, before a whole grove full of laughing strangers was very mortifying to the proud and pampered Imogene.

James arose to his feet with a scarlet face and commenced stammering his apologies. At first she greeted all his explanations with a curt "It is of no consequence, sir," and a supercilious elevation of the eyebrows, when suddenly it occurred to her that as the young man was of fair appearance he might possibly be the means of relieving her of her ennui.

In fact she resolved to commence a flirtation with him then and there, and so when he had for the fifth time explained how the whole thing happened, and bemoaned his stupidity and awkwardness, glancing the while with rueful eyes at her discolored dress, she held out her white bejeweled hand with great frankness and smiled on him most sweetly.

James, though highly delighted, was somewhat taken aback at this sudden change of front, but as he, as has already been said, was rather inclined to flirt himself, and was flattered at her apparent interest in him, he made no audible comments on her changed behavior.

Taking a seat at the table he entered into an animated conversation with her, in the course of which she artlessly gave him to understand that she was very sad and very unhappy, and that she desired above all things, a friend who would sooth her when sad, rejoice with her when merry, and be true to her till death.

Miss Burton looked tenderly at James as she uttered the above sentiment and softly sighed. What wonder the young man's heart beat violently, and his brain was in a whirl? Was not he hobnobbing, so to speak, with the beautiful and aristocratic heiress of whom the whole assemblage stood in awe, whose praises had been so loudly and persistently sung by her uncle, the doughty squire.

The good people of Farnesville and vicinity being early risers were necessarily early retirers; consequently the festival came to an abrupt end at a far earlier hour than Miss Burton's accustomed bedtime.

How short the evening has seemed Mr. Monroe," she said, as she gave him her hand at parting, "and I have you to thank for it. Will you not call on me to-morrow afternoon or evening? Something tells me we are to be the best of friends. Will you come?"

"I shall be delighted to do so," said James. Squire Hurtom coming up at that moment, the young man reluctantly left the heiress and proceeded to seek out his deserted and till then forgotten betrothed. He found her seated near the entrance to the grounds, having with her an old lady whom she had prevailed upon to remain with her until her recreant lover made his appearance. She was very quiet, and as they passed near the large lantern at the gateway leading from the scene of the festivity, James noticed that she was deathly pale and that there was an ominous glitter in her jet black eyes.

The evening was a wonderful one. The stars shone brightly, the moon was at the full, and a cool breeze musically rustled the leaves and fanned the brows of the moody lovers as they silently wended their way toward the home of Mary which was near by. At last James broke the irksome silence with the query:

"How have you enjoyed yourself this evening, Mary?"

"Very well," was the reply; "it would be superfluous for me to repeat that question, for I saw you were enjoying yourself immensely. You doubtless found Miss Burton a very entertaining companion."

"I did," replied James. "She gave me a very cordial invitation to call on her to-morrow afternoon or evening."

"Do you intend doing so?" asked Mary, in a scarcely audible voice.

"I do," was the curt reply.

"Then," said the young girl, "you need never call on me again. We will henceforth be as strangers. Here is your ring." And before the dumbfounded James could reply she hurriedly drew their en-

Pruntytown, Taylor Co., gets the State Reform School.

On September 1st the residence of Mr. A. G. Williams, near Job's Knob, this county, was burned, together with most of its contents. The family were all absent except his daughter, Miss Jennie, who did all she could to extinguish the flames and save the household effects. The fire was caused by a defective flue. Mr. Williams' loss is about $3,000 and no insurance.—Greenbrier Independent.

The crime record in West Virginia during the month of August was an appalling one. No fewer than ten murders, and many lesser offenses were committed, and only in a few instances have the criminals been apprehended. West Virginia's good name will suffer if this rising tide of criminality is not soon checked. If the authorities are too remiss to perform their duties properly, an aroused public sentiment should compel them to do justice. West Virginia is not a lawless State; its citizens are not lawbreakers, and a few criminal should not be allowed to bring discredit upon the law abiding.—Register.

The Young German Emperor.

There is some discussion in the prints as to the character of the German emperor. In the late Mr. Thorndike Rice's evening magazine we have a comparatively full discussion of the matter.

Mr. Poultney Bigelow went to school with the young man—by sufference or by means of money—and he thinks that the young emperor is one of the finest affairs on the top side of the ground.

It must be supposed that there is some mistake here. A young man doesn't love his mother and who has no respect for the memory of his father is not much of a person in any walk of life. As a peasant he would be accounted a brute, and as a king he must be somewhat worse.

There is no more mysterious affair in history than the fact that the German people, who are intelligent, and who are full of the fire and vigor of progress, should submit to be ruled over by a person who hates his mother and despises the memory of his father. It is only less mysterious that the German people should permit any person to rule over them in any shape or form with a power that does not proceed from the people themselves.

But this sort of disease will cure itself in Germany as it has in America and other enlightened nations. A Bismarck would be tolerated in this country about two minutes and a half, and then he would go back to his beer, his dog and his family.

It is a great thing for America that there can be no Bismarcks and no one horse emperors here. We are living in a great time, and to this extent we are a great people. Shew us an American in public life who insults his mother and flouts the memory of his father, and we'll show you the deadest duck that ever quacked.—Atlanta Constitutions.

Bride Removal.

ACADEMY W. VA. Sept, 7th.—ED. TIMES:

It is reported here, that our County Commissioners have at last concluded to take a step in the right direction, in regard to the bridge across Knapp's Creek, and to this end, advertise for bidders to move the bridge, from its present worthless location, to one on the line between Messrs Wm. Curry and Wm. Grose.

To all our citizens, who have seen Knapp's Creek when it was high, the last location mentioned seems the proper one; and in fact I have always been surprised that any other was ever selected. At this point the banks on both sides of the creek are high and the channel deep enough to raise the presumption that the bridge will not eventually span the bed of a dry creek, which was never the case where the bridge now stands. A good crossing can also be secured over Brown's Creek by running across the upper edge of the McGlaughlin place. As to the road on this side it is said that my old friend, Mr. Curry, will never consent for the road to cross his land, but "brethren I am persuaded better things" of Mr. Curry. We believe him to be a man of progressive ideas, and brim full of "the milk of human kindness"—a man whose gratitude will ever be ready to acknowledge his obligations to his fellow citizens of Pocahontas. Mr. Editor Mr. Curry was the clerk of this county years ago, when I was a young man. The people delighted to honor him then, and I know he will only be too happy to give us a road across the bottom if our County Court deem it right. I don't like to hear our old citizens slandered by intimations as above. Another thing, (and a member of the County Court mentioned that), this move would change the road running into Huntersville. Why, what of that my friend? Is the interest of all the people of the county, to come up for consideration before, or after the private interest of one or two citizens? Is this County the province of one or two or does it belong to us all? Does our County Court try to serve all the people, or only a select few? It seems to me, when we elect our Commissioners we elect them to look after the interests of Pocahontas County, and I am glad to say, I believe they have done their best with the lights before them, notwithstanding the howl frequently raised against them. Come fellow citizens, one and all and let us try to uphold the law and support the agents commissioned by us to see to our interests. If they sometimes err, in our judgment, don't let us curse them. We elected them to use their judgments, not ours, and perhaps we would look at this matter differently, were we in their stead. Now Mr. Editor, if you have no objections, I will stop the airhole until another time.

Yours,
A. CITIZEN.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON Sept., 6—Tanner will have to go. That this conclusion has been reached by Secretary Noble is the impression of nine out out of every ten people one meets here, no matter what their politics may be. It is said that Noble was disposed to look over Tanners official acts but his eternal talking was the straw which broke the camels back; as one of Noble's friends puts it "Tanner seems to think that instead of being a subordinate of the Secretary of the Interior he is that officials superior officer." That Tanner will go is extremely probable, but I should not hesitate to wager a big red apple that his resignation will not be asked for until after the Ohio election. Mr. Benjamin Harrison got his political education in Indiana, and is fully aware of the danger there is in attempting to swop horses while crossing a stream.

Senator Barbour, who called a conference of democratic leaders in Virginia this week, says everything is in excellent condition in that State and all the indications point to a big democratic majority.

Langston, the negro who is a contestant for a seat in Congress from the Fourth Virginia district announces that he will support Mahone, provided that Mahone, the Virginian state republican committee and the administration will support him (Langston) in his contest for a seat in the House. To appreciate the coolness of this announcement it must be remembered that Langston ran for Congress on an independent ticket, the regular republican nominee having been named by Mahone. A democrat was elected and Langston is contesting the seat on the ground that the Mahone people state votes cast for him. No matter what Mahone and the rest may promise it is very safe to say that Langston will not occupy that seat in the next Congress.

This administration has developed quite a faculty for disposing of Mr. "Nigger" in a manner that is pleasing to the white republicans. It has just designated Lieutenant Alexander, the only negro officer in the Army, as military attache of the American legation at Hati. Fred Douglass is the minister.

Washington will be designated as the place for holding the American Exposition of 1892 by more than a two thirds vote of Congress. Remember this prediction.

Owing to heavy bond purchases and pension payments the Treasury department for August shows an increase of $5,000,000 in the Public debt.

Ex-congressman Thomas, of Illinois, having declined ex-congressman Little, of Ohio, has been appointed to represent this Government on the Venzuela claims commission. The ex's have no right to complain of the administration.

Ex-representative and ex-senator Norwood, of Georgia, is visiting Washington. He was asked what he thought the administration would effect by its tariff crusade in the south. His answer was: "Ninety-nine out of every one hundred of the intelligent people of the South are tariff reformers. The republicans can do nothing with our people on the tariff question." He was next asked what he thought would be the effect of Congress passing a law to regulate Federal elections. His reply was: "They may pass them laws but they will be a dead letter. It is too late to interfere with the affairs of the South in that way. Our people will not regard any legislation intended to place the negro over them. And the sentiment in the North is against it. As a voter the negro is a failure. Some republicans accuse us of repressing the negro vote, because they are not cast. The fact is merely that the great mass of the negroes not knowing the use of the ballot have got tired now that the novelty is worn off and they do not want to vote, they stay at home."

President Harrison spent an hour in Washington Wednesday afternoon and is expected here again to-night.

HOME NEWS

—Clerk J. J. Beard, was down at Academy, the first of this week.

—Geo. Landes, of Academy, called to see us Monday.

—Several communications were crowded out this week, but will appear next.

—Jno. A. McNeel, little daughter Mary and son Paul, of Knapp's creek were in our office Tuesday.

—The small boy will soon dawn his cap and boots and start for the place of all places, the school house.

—Miss Maggie Slaven, of Green Bank, was visiting relatives in Huntersville a day or two last week.

—We failed to mention last week, that Rev. J. C. Thrasher, of Md., was in our town Sept. 1st and preached a very excellent sermon in the Methodist church.

—We notice in some of our exchanges, "It would be a good idea to have our side walks sprinkled during the big show &c." We would rather have ours drained now, than sprinkled.

—J. H. Doyle, and wife and J. C. Lowry, Jr., started last Friday for Baltimore, where they will spend a few days in buying their fall and winter goods and also "take in" the exhibition.

—Attorney C. F. Moore and wife, started for Green Bank, Tuesday morning to attend the wedding of Mrs. Birtie Barlow to Mr. Wm. Gladwell, also Rice Moore, Esq., of Dunmore came down to escort Miss Lucy Barlow to the same place.

—Now is the time to repair our sidewalks. Fall and winter is approaching, and the first thing we know, we'll have to wade through mud and water a half a foot deep to get our mails, or, to get to church. It won't cost much to have our walks repaired, and now is the time to do it. Here we are, now ready to head the subscription list with a quarter. How's that for a start? Who next?

—The turnpike between Marlinton and the top of Alleghany mountain is in a fearful condition. It can hardly be gotten over safely, even with an ox cart. Teams that have been in the habit of wagoning over this road to Millboro Depot are now going to Ronceverte, a distance of 10 miles further. This matter should be looked after at once, and the road put in, at least, a passable condition.

Hillsboro Happenings.

Prof. Landes is improving slowly.

Mr. Henry Shearer, wife and sister, of Virginia, and Jake McClure, of Edray, were the guests of the Misses Shearer last Saturday night.

Rev. J. C. Thrasher, wife and children accompanied by Miss Pauline McNeel will leave for their home at Ingleside Md. to-morrow.

Mr. A. A. Williams has arrived at this place and taken charge of the art gallery of A. A. Williams and Sons.

Mr. Fred Wallace left for Hampden Sidney college, a few days ago.

Miss Jessie Renick, left this morning for Alderson, to attend the Cottage Home School, taught by Miss Converse.

The Misses Shearer, commenced the third term of the Hillsboro Training School, Sept 4th, with an enrollment of sixteen scholars.

Mr. H. Nathan rented his house in town last Friday to Mr. John B. Marshall, for the period of six months.

Dr. Hales has rented Mrs. Cynthia McNeels property in town and has gone to Virginia for his family.

A handsome reception was given to Mr. E. I. Holt and bride, at the residence of his sister Mrs. Wm. Wysong, last Thursday. They were accompanied to this place by their attendants, Misses Lizzie and Lou Ligon and Mary Beatty, and Messrs Penick Wallace, Jake Hill, Piatt Marshall, and also by Rev. H. H. Bittinger and Miss Belle Price, Mr. Ligon Marshall and Miss Spaulding, and by one usher, Mr. R. K. Burns. The guests in all numbered over one hundred, and certainly were nicely entertained. The table decorations were a perfect marvel of art and loaded with every conceivable dainty that could please the eye or tempt the palate. The young couple certainly deserve to be congratulated on their good looks, as they were pronounced one of the handsomest couples in the Levels. The bride was attired in white surah silk, trimmed with white silk lace and bridal wreath, and the groom wore the conventional black. Every thing passed off nicely with nothing to mar the happiness, except the departure of Mrs. J. W. Holt, the grooms mother, who was called home the day before, by the illness of her daughter Mrs. Sallie Wilkinson, and every one left with many wishes for the future happiness of the young couple.

Sep. 9. PRUNELLA.

Brilliant Wedding.

In the Presbyterian church at Mingo Flats on the 4th inst, E. I Holt, of Hillsboro, and Miss Lucie Marshall, of Mingo Flats, the lovely and accomplished daughter of Capt. J. W. Marshall, were united in the holy bonds of matrimony, by Rev. J. B. Bittinger. The ceremony was beautiful and impressive, and the church was crowded to its utmost capacity.

The church being darkened, was brilliantly illuminated, which displayed to the best advantage, the beautiful floral decoration. Over the aisle through which the bride and her attendants entered, was a large arch of evergreens; in the top of which was placed a beautiful M. made of exquisite white flowers. While the ceremony was being performed the handsome couple stood under an immense floral horse shoe suspended from the dome by white ribbons.

At the close of the ceremony, the bridal pair, led by the maid of honor, who strewed their path with flowers, and followed by the attendants passed down the opposite aisle under a corresponding arch in which was placed a beautiful H. The bride who looks lovely at all times, never appeared more beautiful than when robed in her exquisite bridal gown of white surah and elegant lace which was made entrain. She wore a veil and orange blossoms, and suspended from her left side by loops of white ribbons was an exquisite fan. She carried a lovely boquet of white flowers. The groom appeared in full dress.

The bride's maids and groom's men were as follows:

Miss Ligon, Clover Lick, with Mr. Penick Wallace, Mill Point; Miss Gatewood, Big Spring, Mr. James Reynolds, Roanoke Va.; Miss Lou Ligon, Mr. Jake Hill Clover Lick, and Miss Beatty, Mr. Piatt Marshall, Mingo Flats; Miss Minnie Moore, Maid of honor, Mingo Flats. Miss —— Ligon, wore blue China silk and moire ribbon and carried a bouquet of white dahlias; Miss Gatewood, cream India silk and pearls, bouquet of coral honeysuckle and ferns; Miss Lou Ligon, Pink India silk and illusion, bouquet of hydrangia; Miss Beatty pink surah silk and lace, bouquet of sweet peas and ferns. The brides maids wore their hair tastefully arranged each with a cluster of ostrich tips to correspond with her dress. Miss Minnie Moore wore nile green, and carried a basket of beautiful flowers. After having received the congratulations of their many friends, the bridal party accompanied by the Minister and wife started for Hillsboro, the grooms home, where a large reception was given.

The bride was the recipent of many elegant presents. Among which was a handsome gold watch and, fob present from the groom.

Wayside Notes.

Wednesday, the fourth of September, was a red letter day with your correspondent. At eleven in the morning, the nuptials of Zane Moore and Miss Ida B. Herold were auspiciously celebrated at the residence of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Herold near Frost.

The vows, were pronounced by Wm. T. Price, in the presence of many friends and relatives.

While the wedding march, was being elegantly rendered by Mrs. Lizzie Lockridge, the bridal party appeared in the parlor. Misses Annie Moore, Minnie Dever and Myrtle Hannah were bridesmaids, attended by Messrs. Letcher Herold, Millard Herold and Pounts Moore, in the order named.

Festoons of evergreens, floral decorations, and Chinese lanterns rendered the scene of weird beauty. The bride's attire consisted of white sorrents, silk covered with lace. The attending ladies were tastefully attired, either in cream colored cashimere, or in henrietta cloth of snowy whiteness. A varied and bountiful repast, was much enjoyed by seventy five or eighty persons, served by polite and attentive waiters.

On the afternoon of the same day, Mr. Loring Kerr and Miss Laura E. Orndoff, were happily married at the home of the bride's widowed mother, in the vicinity of Green Bank.

The marriage ceremony was performed at five o'clock, by Wm. T. Price, which was witnessed by a large attendance of invited friends. Misses Otey Riley, Ollie Sutton, Maggie Gum and Cora Wooddell, attended the bride, escorted by Messrs. Mack Kerr, Joseph Kerr, Henry Wooddell and French Sutton, in the order indicated.

The bride and her lady friends in their pure white attire, presented a very engaging scene, as they appeared with their escorts upon the floor.

More than a hundred happy guests shared the feast of good things so profusely provided.

For genuine and innocent social enjoyment, nothing can easily excel marriage scenes like those witnessed the first Wednesday of September, 1889.

Huntersville, W. Va.

September, 12, 1889.

gagement ring from her finger, thrust it into his hands, and, as they had arrived at her father's gate, ran up the graveled walk and into the house without a word of parting.

"Little spitfire," said James to himself. "The idea of acting in this way just because I conversed with Miss Burton a short time."

He did not seem to realize that he had spent nearly the entire evening in Miss Burton's company, neglecting his betrothed to such an extent that even the dullest took cognizance of and commented upon it.

On the following afternoon after making a more than usually elaborate toilet, James presented himself at the door of Squire Hurtom's staring white house and inquired of the trim maid of all work who answered the summons of the bell, if Miss Burton was in. The maid replied in the affirmative, ushered him in to the "best room" where he found the heiress deeply absorbed in the latest society novel. She closed the book at once, and rising from her seat greeted him very warmly.

They were soon conversing as amicably and apparently as intimately as friends of long standing.

When at the end of two hours (which seemed but as two minutes to the infatuated James) he arose to take his departure he was warmly invited to call again. He did so on the very next day, when he was treated with greater kindness if possible than on his former visit. They played several games of croquet together during the course of which it was arranged that on the following afternoon they should take a boat ride on Lily Pond, a small lake in the neighborhood, noted for its white and fragrant water lilies. He also took her out riding behind his span of blood bay horses, and on one occasion escorted her to church where the heiress created an immense sensation as she swept down the central aisle in her trailing, rustling silken gown, while he with head erect, silk tile in hand, and curled moustache, was the envy and despair of all the young men of Barnesville. Even the gray-haired old minister was visibly disconcerted at the sudden and unexpected appearance of so much style and elegance and lost his place in the chapter he was reading, for be it known, Miss Burton always made it a point to arrive late at church as well as at all other public gatherings.

In less than two weeks it was whispered about by the gossips that James Monroe and Mary Murdock had quarreled, that the engagement was broken, and that he was "keeping steady company with that stuck-up, red-haired city girl at Squire Hurtom's."

And it must be said it was all true; James had become infatuated with the fair Imogene and danced perpetual attendance upon her. Her dainty ways, her city bred airs her varying moods, and above all the thought that she was already wealthy and destined at no distant day to become still more so, wrought such havoc in the heart of the unsophisticated youth that he resolved at the first favorable opportunity, to use a phrase much in vogue in those parts, to "pop the question."

Accordingly one pleasant afternoon when he and Imogene were seated on a rustic bench in the very grove where was held the memorable ice-cream festival, he, after much unwonted stammering, plumped down on his knees and proposed in the most dramatic manner imaginable—and was greeted with a loud and ringing peel of laughter. He had never heard Miss Burton laugh before, and the sound, however birdlike, or flutelike he might have considered it under other circumstances, was, just at that moment far from pleasant to him.

"Marry you," she said, when she could fully control her risibility. "Marry a farmer? And I suppose you would expect me to milk the cows, and sweep and cook and wash, as do all the good housewives of Barnesville and vicinity. No, Mr. Monroe, the idea is impracticable, and, I will add, utterly impossible; for I am engaged to a gentleman in New York and am to be married early in the fall. I have enjoyed your company very much indeed. You have helped to relieve the tedium of this beautiful though monotonous place, and for that I am truly thankful; but such a thing as becoming your wife has never once entered my head. You must learn to forget me. I leave for Boston to-morrow morning and you doubtless will exemplify the truth of the old adage; 'Out of sight, out of mind.' And now let me give you a little good advice. I have heard something of a little black-eyed girl to whom you quarreled, presumably over poor me. Return to your allegiance. Marry her; she will make you a good wife, and you will both live to laugh over your silly misunderstanding, and at me."

With these words Miss Burton arose, and swiftly and silently glided from the grove, leaving James Monroe dumbfounded and crestfallen, and yet with a secret feeling in his heart that he had been rightly served.

After the first ranklings of his wounded self love had died out, he bethought him of Miss Burton's advice and called at the Murdock homestead. He was ushered into the familiar parlor where had passed so many pleasant happy hours, by one of Mary's younger sisters, and, in a short time Mary made her appearance. She was as bright and cheery as ever and apparently harbored no ill-feeling because of his past conduct, but when he drew forth the engagement ring she had so long worn, and attempted to place it upon her finger and again gain her consent to be his wife, she drew back with a quick, proud movement and said:

"No, James, I shall always be a friend to you, but never your wife. You have shown plainly that you did not love me as you ought, and I feel it is best we should henceforth meet merely as friends and neighbors. I will own that I have felt very badly over the way—the way you have used me. But time heals all wounds."

"Yes, time and John Graves," said James angrily, as he seized his hat. "I have heard of his coming here, and if you care more for that lout than for me all I have to say is: Marry him."

Thus speaking, he flounced out of the room, and forgetting to slam the door behind him. Mary's black eyes fairly snapped with just anger and indignation. But the storm in her bosom subsided as rapidly as it had arisen, and in a low heartfelt voice, [illegible] said: "Thank God for my nar[illegible] escape."

John Gr[illegible], whom James Monroe had de[illegible]nated "a lout," was a young f[illegible]r living about three miles fro[illegible] Mr. Murdock's. He was a stea[illegible] upright young man, not given t[illegible] [illegible]ting on airs," but honest and [illegible] his friends as the needle [illegible] pole. He had a large fa[illegible] [illegible]athed him by his father, which he [illegible] to the very bes[illegible] advantage. In [illegible], he was considered the best farmer near Barnesville. His mother and a maiden sister attended to the household duties, while he and two "hired men" were constantly employed in bringing his broad acres into the highest state of productiveness. The following autumn, Mary Murdock married. And at about the same time Imogene Burton was lead to the altar by "a gentleman of New York."

A. (somewhat illiterate)—"I read something in a paper about idiots. Are they human beings?"

B.—"Certainly; they are human beingg like yourself."

Guest—"See here, waiter! There's a pin in this soup. Suppose I had swallowed it?" Waiter—"It wouldn't have hurt yer, sah. Don't you notice that it am a safety pin, sah?"

Miss Prue—What's that bit of red sticking out of Miss Lowcutt's corsage?

Miss Caustique—Perhaps it is the top of her stocking.

She—There! I've upset that vase and spilled the water all over me.

He (sympathetically)—Too bad. How will you dry your hand?

She (a divine inspiration lighting up her face)—Can't you ring it for me?

"I want to get a good hammock," said the customer.

"Strong enough to hold two, I suppose?" suggested the salesman shyly.

"No, sir," said the customer, with some show of resentment. "No, sir; I've been married for more than three years."

Three of a Kind.

Three things to love—Courage, gentleness, affectionateness.

Three things to admire—Intellectual power, dignity, gracefulness.

Three things to hate—Cruelty, arrogance, ingratitude.

Three things to reverence—Religion, justice, self-denial.

Three things to wish for—Health, a cheerful spirit, friends.

Three things to like—Cordiality, good humor, mirthfulness.

Three things to suspect—Flattery, puritanism, sudden affection.

Three things to avoid—Idleness, flippant jesting, loquacity.

Three things to govern—Temper, impulse, the tongue.

Three things to be prepared for—Decay, change, death.

"I am truly sorry to give you pain, Mr. Haukinson," said the young lady, "but please do not allude to the subject again. I can never be your wife."

"That is your final answer, Miss Irene?"

"It is."

"Nothing could induce you to change your decision?"

"My mind is fully and unalterably made up."

"Miss Irene," said the young man rising and looking about for his hat, "before coming here this evening I made a bet of $50 with Van Perkins that you would say no to my proposal. I have won. It was taking a risk, but I was dead broke, Miss Irene," he continued, his voice quivering with emotion, "you have saved a despairing man from the fate of a suicide, and won the life-long respect and esteem of a grateful heart. Good evening."

THE PATRIOT FUGITIVE.

A TALE OF THE REVOLUTION.

Comely Mistress Sally Suydam sat on a low bench beneath the apple-tree in her back yard, shelling peas. Delicate petals from the fragrant blossoms overhead dropped upon her; the bluebird perched upon the hollow stump hard by sang to her a song of spring and sunshine; the fresh morning breeze that made ripples all across the golden surface of Flushing Bay to mark its progress, came to lift carelessly the soft, brown curls on her temples. Before her, on an upturned pail, rested a gaunt old man, with white hair, and long, bony fingers that were interlocked over his knobby knee.

"Indeed," spoke Mistress Suydam continuing her conversation, "it is hard that Abner should be so long away from his home and in peril of his life, but he would be no true American did he lag at his wife's apron string when his country has need of him. And, of a truth, instead of repining I should rejoice daily that he is still alive and at liberty. I think I would rather hear that he had fallen on the field than that he was a prisoner in the cruel hands of the British——"

"In that Jersey prison ship. Verily, it is wondrous that men endure to live in that hell upon earth if the half that is told of it be true."

"The half of its horrors hath not been told!" exclaimed a suppressed but distinct voice, from the clump of lilac bushes behind Mrs. Suydam. The good dame gave a little jump and an exclamation alarm, while the gaunt man sprang to his feet. Peering in the direction of the voice, they saw under the bushes, close to the ground, the haggard, yellow face of a man with great wild eyes and tangled hair and beard.

"Who are you, and what want you here?" demanded Mistress Suydam, stoutly.

"Robert Jameson; a fugitive from the Jersey prison-ship am I, and sore in need of all that man may need to live."

"Come forth, man; come forth. You shall need no longer here," responded the old man earnestly, going toward him.

"Back—back! Keep your distance, man! There is death in my garments—the poison of the prison-fever. Stand aloof; but I pray you lay some food where I may get it without coming anigh you."

While he spoke Mistress Suydam reflected, and when he had ceased, quickly took the ordering of affairs in her hands. Giving to the old man—who was none other than the patriot-parson Egbert Ellis—a suit of her soldier-husband's clothing, she instructed him to see that the fugitive, after casting away his infected garments, bathed in the creek at the foot of the garden, and then put on the clean raiment, by which time she would have a good breakfast ready for him.

When Jameson's hunger had been appeased, he told his story:

"I was taken prisoner through the running down of the boat I was in on the Hudson, and was put aboard the prisonship three months ago. The night before last I sprang overboard, being willing rather to die than live longer there; but coming ashore a little below the tide mill, I managed to make my way into the country, and since then, hiding when I could, and running when I dared, I have fled thus far, eating nothing until now. How anxiously I listened to your speech to learn if ye were friends or foes!"

"Is life on the prisonship indeed so terrible as men say?" asked Mrs. Suydam.

"Only the dead have learned all its horrors, but the living there know enough to madden them. Twelve hundred men are crowded in a space that would not suffice for the healthful keeping of one-fourth so many. They are scantily fed upon tainted meat and vermin-infested bread, so that violent and fatal disorders are rife among them. The dreaded fever hath broken out, and so rages that at times as many as two hundred die of it in a night. Through sheer malignity the British officers refuse water even to those parched with the fever, and find sport in seeing their burning thirst drive them mad. Often in the inky darkness of the lower gun-deck, where they are confined at night, the startling cry is heard: 'Look to yourselves! One here hath gone mad and he hath a knife.' And the madman, knowing not what he does, slashes right and left with his weapon, until in self-defense they must kill him—and all that in the dark. And this much amuses the British officers.

"Lord let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell," ejaculated the pastor, in fervent quotation of the psalmist.

"Amen!" responded Jameson between his clenched teeth, continuing his narrative. "It is a common sport with them to cast apples among the prisoners to set them fighting. The wretched men, whose minds are weakened by their sufferings, seem maddened, at sight of the tempting fruit, and will beat and tear each other, with claws and teeth, like starving, ravenous beasts to get possession of it—whereat the British officers laugh heartily and enjoy themselves mightily."

"Lord, let burning coals fall upon them; let them be cast into the fire into deep pits, that they rise not up again," broke forth the parson.

"Men are shot down like dogs by the sentries, who act under orders, excuse therefor being found in the slightest breach of discipline."

"Woe unto the wicked! It shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given him."

"Again and again a cartel hath come for an exchange of prisoners, and those upon whom Death's hand is already laid have been sorted out to send away, while those with more life in them were put back with the cruel jibe: 'You have not been here long enough; you are too well to exchange.'"

"Lord, how long shall the wicked triumph?"

Mistress Suydam's cheeks were very pale, and her eyes blazed with indignation. Each of the excited parson's scriptural quotations were expressive of her sentiments, but she did not open her lips until he uttered, as a prayer:

"Lord, root them out of the land of the living; pity them not, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them utterly."

Then she earnestly ejaculated "Amen!"

All that day Robert Jameson lay in hiding among the bushes back of Mistress Suydam's house, resting, sleeping and rapidly regaining his strength, while she watched over his safety and fed him.

Parson Ellis went away. Before taking his departure, he told the fugitive:

"I am sent here on a mission in which it may be God's will that I shall lay down my life, and, indeed, the chance for it is so great that I set small store by the boat that is moored in the bay near the mouth of this creek. If I come off alive, I shall easily find another boat. This one you had better take, and as soon as the moon hath set to-night, sail for New London, where you will be safe. Go not before, lest you be overhauled on the sound and recaptured."

"I will never be taken alive," answered Robert, firmly.

"You are a brave man, and I do not doubt your intent, but we are all in the hand of God. If you reach New London safely, give the boat in charge of Ebenezer Holden whom you will easily find. And now, farewell."

Robert feared to remain in the house, lest he might be surprised by a party of the British dragoons, who as he was informed, were continually scouring the island. Near nightfall Mistress Suydam came rushing down to him from the upper window where she had long been sitting, watching that she might note the approach of an enemy far off.

"The dragoons are coming!" she cried to him.

A dozen of them were coming down the road at an easy, swinging trot, with Captain Tileston at their head. Of course the fugitive imagined that they were in pursuit of him, but they were not. He was supposed to have been drowned and eaten by the sharks, numbers of which savage creatures were attracted to the vicinity of the prison-ship by the prey that was either tossed to them or that voluntarily leaped overboard. The dragoons had quite another object than his capture in their coming. But he thought only of flight.

He ran swiftly down the brook crouching below the line of rank grass that margined its banks, until he reached the bay, where he plunged in and disappeared. Day was ended by this time, but the early rising moon gave so clear a light that he did not dare to attempt reaching the parson's boat, though it was only four or five rods from where he took to the water. A couple of the dragoons rode leisurely down to the bay, and there sat upon their horses, chatting. They were discussing the catching of spies who were supposed to land there from the Connecticut or New York shore. Presently Captain Tileson, with four more men, joined ed them. They had stopped to search for rebels in Mistress Suydam's house. The captain had a plan.

"It is useless," he said, "for us to attempt the capture, upon the water, of these Yankee spies, who have eyes like hawks by day and owls by night, and could see us long before we could see them. We must let them land. As I have sharper sight than any of you at night, I will conceal myself in the boat and watch for them. You will hide in yonder clump of woods. When they land I will signal to you, by imitating the plover's cry, which way to dash to fall upon them—once for this way, twice for that—and at the same moment will seize their boat to cut off their retreat."

So it was arranged. One of the dragoons waded out to the parson's little sail-boat and drew her in so that the Captain could step aboard dry-shod, after he moored her out again. Then the dragoons went away into the woods, and the Captain laid down in the boat to watch and wait for events. Events were rapidly approaching him that he had no conception of.

A big, floating bunch of sedge grass drifted out from near the shore toward the boat, slowly approaching it closer and closer. At length it seemed to lodge against the boat. The Captain did not notice it. He was looking in the opposite direction. Noiselessly a head rose out of the water behind him—the head of Robert Jameson—close by the bunch of floating grass. The next moment a long arm reached over the low side of the boat, and a powerful hand gripped the Captain's throat—gripped it with such ferocious energy that it cut off his breath, made the world turn black before him, and seemed to paralyze him. Before he could make a movement of self defense, or a sound, a man rolled into the boat upon him, and seizing one of his big holster pistols that he had laid beside him dealt such a blow upon his temple that he was stunned and lay as still as if dead.

When the Captain recovered his senses he found himself bound hand and foot with the anchor rope. His captor had stepped the mast. The little sail was bellying full with a favoring southeast breeze, and the shore was far behind. The next morning he was turned over to the military authorities at New London as a prisoner; and undesirable as that fortune of war may be deemed, he at least had the consolation of knowing that in the hands of Americans he would suffer from no such fiendish inhumanity as was practiced under the English flag aboard the Jersey prison ship.

Robert Jameson was regarded as quite a hero in New London, where he promptly re-entered the service, and fought bravely until the end of the war.

Tasting the Scratch.

There had been some hard words between Julius and Moses before, as near as I could make out, says a writer in the New York Evening Sun. Moses was blacking my boots on the verandah when Julius came around from the kitchen and began:

"Look heah, boy; I'se done got my eye-ball on you, an' de fust thing you know I'll pound you to squash!"

"Shoo! Does you know who you is conversin' wid?" demanded Moses. "Doan' you talk to me dat way, black man."

"Who's black man?"

"You is."

"You was a liar sah!"

"So was you?"

"Look out, boy! A feller dun called me liah one time and de county had to bury him."

"An' you look out for me, black man; I'se mighty hard to wake up, but when I gits aroused I whoop all de way thru."

"Shoo! I just want to say to you dat de las' fight I was in it took eight men to hold me. Doan' you get me mad, boy—doan' you do it."

"Boss! I does put my hand right on yo' shoulder."

"An' I does put my hand on yours."

"Now what yo' gwine ter do?"

"Now what you gwine ter do?"

"Shoo!"

"Shoo!"

And after standing in defiance for a moment each walked slowly away and went about his business, to renew the "sh[illegible]" at [illegible] opportunity and always with the same result.

Miss Flimsy—But, Father, you must remember that I am to marry Charlie. It isn't you that will marry him.

Old Flimsy—Quite true, my dear. But you mustn't forget that I will probably have to support him.

The Prosperous South.

The South is better off, as respects material wealth, than for many years past. Its social, intellectual, moral and political condition has improved, it is believed, at an almost equal rate. The white population, not been affected by immigration, is American still to the backbone, and it is animated by sentiments of devotion to constitutional which render the South the conservative element of the Union. Its growth in wealth, in culture, in population and political influence is, therefore, in the interest of free institutions, to be desired by the whole country.—Baltimore Sun.

John L. Sullivan for Congress.

New York, September 7.—John L. Sullivan in a letter in the Evening Sun announces that he is a candidate for congress from the Boston, Mass., district when the next fall elections are held. He will run he says as a Democrat. In the course of his letter he says: "Any man who doubts my popularity with the American people has only got to travel about with me to get rid of the notion. Some may misconstrue my occupation in life. They don't know what they are talking about. My business is and always has been ever since I came before the public to encourage physical culture. A man who can quiet a crowd in Madison square garden as I have done, can make his presence felt in Congress, or anywhere else on earth."

WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON Sept., 13.—Corporal Tanner is gone. The Pension office will know him no more, at least not as its chief. He will of course, continue to draw his pension. The long wrangle between the "Corporal" and Secretary Noble reached its culminating point this week, when the Secretary suspended Tanner from office, pending the result of the investigation now going on. Tanner refused to consider himself suspended unless the order came direct from the President. That brought the whole matter before President Harrison, who was compelled to delay his intended departure for Deer Park in order to hear the parties to this dispute. Exactly what was said when Tanner and Noble met in the Presidents private office, where they had been summoned will probably never be known, as the only witnesses were President Harrison and Marshall Randell. But it is understood that Secretary Noble told President Harrison that the investigation now going on in the Pension office had convinced him that Tanner was both inefficient and indiscreet, and that he had suspended him from office until the investigation was closed when he expected the result would be ample to demand his summary dismissal. Tanner claimed to be innocent of either wrong doing or indiscreetness. Exactly what the President did, has not yet been made public, but Tanner's resignation is known to be in the hands of the President. Secretary Noble is known to have been bitterly opposed to allowing Tanner to resign; he thinks he should be dismissed, and only wants to wait until he gets the official report of the investigating commission, in order to show the public that the dismissal is deserved. Assistant Commissioner Smith, is acting Commissioner of Pensions, and Tanner has not been to the office since Tuesday, when he shook hands with one of the employes, and told him that he (Tanner) never expected to come into the building again.

General Rosecrans, the democratic veteran who has been Register of the Treasury since the early days of Mr. Cleveland's administration, was removed by rumor this week to make a place for Tanner. As usual, rumor lied. Gen. Rosecrans has not been removed, and I have it from high republican authority that he will not be disturbed during Harrison's administration. My informant gave two reasons why: Many G. A. R. men had asked for his retention and, he is Chauncey Depews relative by marriage.

Think it of my countrymen the rolls of the Pension office contained on the last day of June 489,725 pensioners and is still increasing. The figures are from an official statement just issued.

Secretary Proctor is laying the wires to succeed Senator Morrill, of Vermont, whose term expires in 1891, and Senator Edmunds is doing all he can to assist him.

Representative Norwood of Georgia, has a level head. He says: "I think the worlds fair of 1892 will be held in Washington. It is the proper place for it—the only place where it could have a national character. The celebration must be national, must be the celebration of the whole people—every man woman and child—and must be held at its National capital. The Southern Congressmen are all for Washington."

Ex-Senator Riddleberger of Virginia has returned to the democratic party. He will stump Virginia in opposition to Mahone.

President Harrison has settled a long wrangle by making the rest of the Federal appointments for New York City.

Hymen's Festivities.

One of the most beautiful weddings of the season was that of Mrs. Bertie Barlow to Mr. William Gladwell, which occurred on the morning of the 11th of Sept. at the home of the bride's father, Major Arbogast, near Green Bank.

As the hour of 7 drew nigh the conventional march was played till the party had arranged itself in the parlor. The beautiful Methodist ceremony was most impressively rendered by the Rev. Mr. Ballengee.

The attendants were:

Miss Lucy Barlow with Mr. Rice Moore; Miss Mattie Hevener, Mr. Early Arbogast; Miss Flora Mooman, Mr. John Hevener; Miss Otie Cackley, Mr. Harry Moore; Miss Minnie Bradshaw, Mr. Snowdan Moomaw; Miss Lena Burner, Mr. Wilson; Miss Monte Arbogast, Mr. McMulty; Miss Minnie Patterson, Mr. Howard Arbogast.

The bride was most becomingly attired in a henrietta of Dove's grey with embroidery of white daises and wore a corsage bouquet of La France roses. The maids wore Directoires of the same soft shade, Doves grey.

The many pretty and valuable presents of which the bride was the recipient betokened the high esteem in which she was held. After a most delightful breakfast the bridal party started for McDowell, the home of the groom, and the guests took leave of their genial host and hostess, and started to their respective homes, feeling as if it were good for them to have been there.

DIED.—Fanny Cleveland, infant daughter of J. O. and Eva Beard, near Green Bank Sept. 6, 1889, after a brief illness, aged 11 months, lacking one day. A sweet precious body, newly allowed to appear on earth, then was taken to bloom forever in the "Garden of Paradise." Cheer up dear sorrowing parents, brothers and sisters, you can not, would not, call her back, but you can all "go to her." A more affecting scene was never witnessed by the writer, than was that of the family, all kneeling around the little quiet sleeper bidding her "good bye" till they all met again.

Obituary.

Again the cloud of gloom and death overshadows us. About 4 o'clock on Saturday Evening, Aug. 17, 1889 passed from earth to the heavenly world, Miss Sallie M. Patterson, daughter of F. J. and Rachel Patterson, near Glade Hill, this county in great peace.

Sister Sallie was converted to God at the early age of 13 years, under the Ministry of Rev. H. M. Strickler, and joined the M. E. Church, South, in which she lived a Christians life.

It is certainly true in this case, that death loves a shining mark. Sallie was the idol of the home; and she was known and loved by a large circle of friends, both young and old.

She bore her great afflictions which lasted for several weeks, with a Christians patience, saying the will of the Lord be done. Her resignation to her heavenly Fathers will, was perfectly beautiful. Her death, while it is sad to give up one so young, was sublimely beautiful, even beyond description. Just before her spirit took its contesting flight her Lord seemed to open to her vision, scenes in the heavenly world. After having looked to her beloved parents and sorrowing friends around her bedside and praying for everybody, she sank down as if asleep; when suddenly she aroused up and called her mother and said to her, "Oh mother, I was high up in heaven. God is all around my bed and in the room."

While thus engaged she passed into the blissful world shouting the praise of Him who with us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Thanks be unto God for such a triumphant victory over the lost enemy in the death of our Sister.

About her life, much might be said, but this will suffice:

She was a kind, obedient daughter, a gentle, loving Sister, an affectionate friend, a true genuine Christian.

May the consolations of divine grace be given the sorrow stricken family and in the end may they all meet in heaven.

After the funeral services, which were conducted the next evening, (Sunday), the large and weeping congregation of relatives and friends followed her remains to a newly made grave yard, just north, overlooking the home of her childhood, on a beautiful eminence, where with tender hands, her body was laid away, to rest till the resurrection morn.

HER PASTOR.

A terrible storm pervailed on the Atlantic last week, in which dozens of vessels were lost and a number of lives, and the coast is strewn for miles with wreckage.

Relics of the Johnstown Disaster.

With very few exceptions, all the New York "boys" of the press who did duty at Johnstown brought back relics of the eventful trip. Among a collection which I happened to see was a gravure type of the Madonna. The flood had evidently torn the picture from the frame, but the face was not marred in the least. The relic was pasted upon a large white sheet of card board, and the whole piece so framed that the ragged and torn edges were visible. Among the same collection was a marble which had been taken from the little hand of a dead child which the reporter had stumbled over the first night he spent in the village. A more interesting souvenir, but one fraught with more sad recollections, is the silver half dollar wrapped in a piece of brown paper, upon which was written the following sentences: "Three and a half pounds of brown sugar, one pound of starch; yeast cake." The handwriting was that of a woman, and the coin and paper were tightly clinched in the hand of a twelve year-old girl, whose body was found half buried in the sand.

"Were you ever engaged in a train robbery?" asked the prosecuting attorney, looking at him keenly.

"I was never indicted for train robbing," answered the witness, evasively.

"That is not the question," said the lawyer. "I will ask you again. Were you ever a train robber?"

"Judge," said the witness, turning imploringly to the dignitary on the bench, "must I answer that question?"

"You must," answered the judge. "And remember you are under oath."

The witness turned pale and his knees knocked together.

"I suppose it's got to come out. I sold books and bananas on the cars for a whole year when I was a young fellow," faltered the miserable man.

"Harry," exclaimed the blushing Laura, "this declaration is so sudden that I—that—that I hardly know what to say. I was unprepaired for it. It unnerves me."

"I was afraid it might," said the young druggist, rising with alacrity from his knees, "and I brought along a bottle of my unrivalled nerve anodyne. This preparation, darling," he added, soothingly, as he took a bottle from his pocket, quickly extracted the cork, and poured a quantity of the medicine into a spoon he had also brought along, "will allay any undue excitement, quiet the nerves, aid digestion, and restore lost appetite. I sell it at 60 cents a bottle. This is the dose for an adult. Take it, dearest."

Bob Bluger—"Have you heard the latest news, Miss Chester?"

Miss Chester—"Yes, indeed, I just heard the library clock strike twelve.

Jimmy Freshley (stopping in front of the new neighbor and gazing intently at her)—"Ain't I a brave boy, Mrs. Spinks?"

"Mrs. Spinks—"Why?"

Jimmy—"'Cause mamma said you were a perfect fright, but you don't scare me a bit."

She—O, George, I think ma is too mean for anything. She said last night if I ever married she would give the piano to my little sister.

He—Did she? By the way, dear, I'm ready to marry you at any time now. The last obstacle has been removed.

Miss Pique—I'll institute a breach of promise suit against you and show the letters you have written to me.

Mr. Jill—Well, I have no reason to feel mortified over any part of them, save the address on the envelopes.

In a police Court—"Prisoner, you've been brought before me three times within a year, and that's three times to often."

Well, your honor, my case is a hard one and no mistake. When I work at my profession I'm arrested for stealing. If I don't work then I get took up for loafing.

He—And you are sure that I am the first and only man who ever kissed you?

She—Of course, I am sure. You do not doubt my word, do you?

He—Of course I do not doubt you, my darling. I love you too madly, too devotedly for that. But why, O why did you reach for the lines the very instant I ventured to put my arm around you if you had never been there before?

Little Roger—"Uncle John, I heard papa say you got pretty well soaked last night. Did it rain very hard?"

Uncle John (with a sickly smile) —"I don't exactly remember, Roger; I know I was dry enough early in the evening."

Two Paris loafers are reading a notice: "Lost, a black poodle. One hundred francs reward." One of them says to the other:

"You must take the one you stole yesterday."

"But it is white."

"You must say that it has turned white through grief."

Colonel Kaw (of Kansas)—It's gettin' so that science, once the friend of man, is fast becoming his bitterest enemy. Here some son of a gun of a scientist has discovered that chloride of lime is a better antidote for snake bites than whisky.

Colonel Kent (of Kentucky)—What of it?

Colonel Kaw (of Kansas)—What of it? Why, man alive, you'd know what of it if you lived in a State where you have to get your whisky on a prescription!

Anxious Mother—"My dear, I'm afraid George is getting into bad company. He is out very late nearly every night."

Observing Father—"Oh, he's all right. He goes to see some girl or other. Shouldn't wonder if he'd announce an engagement soon."

"He hasn't said a word about any young lady."

"No; but he's keeping company with one all the same. His right wrist is full of pin scratches."

Bunco Steerer (to Farmer)—Isn't this Mr. Swansdown, of Graybeck Corners?" Farmer—"That's me." Bunco Steerer—"My name is Jim Sharper, son of old man Sharper, the banker in your town." Farmer—"Your looks don't show it; but, by gosh, Jim, I'm glad to see you! I dropped into Wall street to-day, and you've got to help me git back to the Corners, or I'll have to walk."

Mrs. Gadd—Does your boy take after you or his father? Mrs. Gabb—He takes after his father. You never can believe a word he says.

At a college examination—"And now, sir, let us see whether you know more about physical science than about the other subjects you have studied. What are the properties of heat?"

"One of its properties is to cause expansion."

"Correct give me an illustration."

"Oh, that's easy enough. In summer, the sun, being hotter, causes the days to lengthen, sir."

Mrs. Aleet—If you should make a thousand dollars unexpectedly, Tom, would you give me that diamond pendant I've been looking at so long?

Mr. Aleet—Why, yes, dear."

Mrs. Aleet—Very well, I'll order it to-morrow. I stopped wanting that ivory finished piano to day, and a thousand was just the price of it."

Hotel call-boy—Madam, you must hurry if you would save your life, The hotel is all on fire, This is the third time I have warned you.

Lady guest—Well, tell the firemen to keep the flames under control until I take out my curl papers and friz my hair I just know there's a great crowd of men down there, and some of them are newspaper reporters.

THE DRESSMAKER.

"Yes, I'm up early," said Mrs. Ford, leaning over the side paling to talk to her next neighbor. "I'm going to have a dressmaker to-day to start my henrietta cloth. She lives in town"—Mrs. Ford's charming home was a little out—" and my brother Jim has gone for her with the dog cart. Stowe is her name; I haven't even seen her. I sent Rob's nurse girl to engage her."

"Stowe? There, now, I guess you've done it!" said Mrs. Sayles, raising her inquisitive little upturned nose, with brisk enjoyment to Mrs. Ford's tall blonde prettiness. "It isn't best to have her if there's a young man in the house. They all fall in love with her so they say. She's pretty, you know, in that showy sort of way—red hair and pink cheeks—and I guess she knows it. Mrs. Ritter had her a while back, and Paul Ritter was crazy after her; and they say she flirted with him awfully, and then threw him over. I presume she thought she could do better. He isn't so well off as your brother Jim, for instance," said Mrs. Sayles, shrewdly smiling.

"But Jim," said Mrs. Ford, serenely—"Jim never falls in love. He never has once, do you know? I think it's because he's so superior to all girls. Oh, yes, of course, I should feel dreadfully! I feel that Jim is on my responsibility while he's with me, and I should be brokenhearted. But there isn't the least danger with Jim."

The dogcart was rolling in the drive, and Mrs. Ford went across the smooth lawn, with six-year-old Rob at her heels.

Jim—tall and blonde, and handsome like his sister—was driving slowly to the horse-block. He was turned squarely toward the dressmaker, and his gaily-enthusiastic tones were audible to Mrs. Ford.

He did not appear to know when he had reached the block; he talked absorbedly on. Mrs. Ford was thankful that Mrs. Sayles was out of hearing.

"Jim!" she said.

And Jim jumped out, lifted the dresmaker down, presented her to his sister, walked with her up to the porch-steps and pulled forth a chair. He was brisk and smiling.

Mrs. Ford sighed with relief that the bay window hid them from Mrs. Sayles.

"We've a nice view from here, don't you think, Miss Stowe?" said Jim eagerly. "Those woods over there, with the break where the sky—"

"I have everything ready for you, I think, Miss Stowe," said Mrs. Ford, distinctly, and took Miss Stowe indoors.

She intended sewing in the dining room—it was large and cool and light; but it was on that account that Jim was won't to lounge there. The upstairs hall would do. There was a window at the back.

She took Miss Stowe up stairs.

"It's rather warm," she apologized, "but it will be cooler later."

It would not be cooler before five o'clock, but Mrs. Ford congratulated herself warmly. For Miss Stowe was pretty, with a lithe form in a blue gown, and hair not red but darkly auburn, and cheeks not vulgarly pink but softly tinted, and bright eyes.

"It is very comfortable," she said cheerfully. "I will take your measure. Shall you like a basque?"

And Mrs. Ford forgot Jim in pleasurable plannings.

But at the end of fifteen minutes there was a clatter below and a rush up stairs.

"Why, I've been looking for you everywhere!" said Jim, in injured tones, lifting Rob from his shoulders to the top stair.

He sat down in the window seat. Miss Stowe sat near the window.

"Is there anything you want, Jim?" said his sister, with severe eyes upon him.

But it was doubtful whether Jim heard. He was springing after the spool Miss Stowe had dropped.

"I want to show you that old coin I told you about, Miss Stowe" he declared. "See—1740. Oh, stop that snipping and look at it!"

But Miss Stowe, smiling and faintly flushing, looked at it over her snipping.

"Who drove into the yard?" Mrs. Ford demanded, cutting a gore at a wrong angle with nervous hands.

"Oh, Jeff Loury! I must tell you about Jeff, Miss Stowe. He's been wearing a beard for two years, and he went down town the other day without it, and the fellows didn't know him. He's—"

"I thought you were going driving with him?" Mrs. Ford interposed.

"Oh, it's too warm!" Jim responded, as blandly as though rattling down shady roads were indeed warmer than the upstairs hall.

His sister watched him wofully. Jim, talking to a young lady, with smiling gusto and fascinated gaze, and foregoing a drive and the morning papers and his cigar for this alone!

He had stayed in his room for three hours to escape the Kenny girls, and come nigh to dying the evening Miss Markham had called. The Kenny girls did not have red lips and shining eyes, to be sure, and if Jim had told them stories, they could never have listened so prettily as did Miss Stowe. But was she the girl for Jim? Mercy, mercy, no!

It did not serve to calm Mrs. Ford that Mrs. Sayles should come over, and, after inquiring of the girl, bustle up stairs.

Her sharp gaze fixed itself on Jim, lounging in the window, his handsome head bent toward the dressmaker and his honest blue eyes unflinchingly upon her.

"You dressmaking, too?" cried Mrs. Sayles, with a triumphant glance at Mrs Ford. "You don't mean that you're staying away from the ball game—you?"

"Oh, I don't care for it this weather!" said Jim, unblushingly—Jim who had breathlessly watched a game last week from the sunny side of the grand-stand, with the thermometer at ninety-eight.

Mrs. Sayles laughed delightedly.

"Yes, I will have a point in the back, Miss Stowe," said Mrs. Ford with cold ignoring of Mrs. Sayles and her rejoicing.

But she was in a despairing mental tumult. Mrs. Sayles' small, keen eyes seemed periods which pointed and made complete and certain what she had tried not to believe.

He was in love with her. And with Jim, who was ardent and singleminded, it was likely—it was certain to be serious. And who was she? Mrs. Ford did not know—probably nobody did.

She stared at her bastings with unseeing eyes.

Jim, with his good looks and cleverness, and family histories for both sides of the family, with a coat-of-arms in each—the lions on their hind legs in their centres seemed to prance before her eyes—and a dressmaker whom they didn't even know!

What should she do? What would her father and mother say to it, and to her? It would never have happened if Jim hadn't been visiting her.

She was in a whirl of helpless agitation. She could not tell the right from the wrong side of the cloth.

And where was Rob? His nurse was setting the dinner table, and his mother had meant to oversee him, but she hadn't. He might be over playing with those rough little Beldens, for all she knew.

"Well, I just ran over," said Mrs Sayles, airily. "I won't stay since you're all so busy."

And Mrs. Ford knew, as she ran down stairs, that the Dwyers and the Bidwells at least would know the state of affairs within half an hour.

"You are basting those darts too high, Miss Stowe," said Mrs. Ford, sharply.

And Miss Stowe, who was basting the darts exactly right, flushed and raised wondering eyes.

"And I never have my collars so high—" Mrs. Ford stopped. "What is that?" she cried, nervously.

It was a sound of feet on the porch; feet and shrill young voices and sobs in a terrified little voice that Mrs. Ford knew.

"It's Rob!" she cried, flying down stairs.

It was Rob in the arms of the Beldens' gardener, and the three small Beldons were close behind and all talking together, rather enjoyingly than otherwise.

"He fell out of the hammock." "We was swinging him, you know, awful [illegible]." "And you ought to heard him holler." "And I guess he's broke his leg; he came down awful hard."

Mrs. Ford gatherad her boy into her arms.

"Go home you little wretches!" she sobbed, hysterically. "Oh, my baby! And I didn't watch him—I didn't know where he was! Is the leg broken?" she demanded, wildly, of Miss Stowe, who had come down with Jim and stood beside her.

"I'll see," said Miss Stowe.

It did not seem odd to Mrs. Ford that she said it, and she was not astonished when the pretty dressmaker took Rob into her own arms and laid him on a sofa.

She watched her dazedly, wringing her hands. Miss Stowe rolled down the small black stockings and leaned over them.

"There isn't anything broken," she said, tremulously; "but the right leg is dislocated at the knee. The sooner it is set the better, and I think, Mrs. Ford, if you will let me, I can do it."

The color was gone from her cheeks; but she held Rob's hands firmly.

"Let you," cried Mrs. Ford, "Oh, if you can!"

"It will hurt," said the dressmaker; "but only a minute."

And she gave a sudden, quick, strong jerk to Rob's leg; and then sat down quite pale and faint, while the little boy cried on his mother's arm.

"I never did it before," she said; "but I've seen it done, and I think I did it right. The doctor will know."

Mrs. Ford went up stairs an hour later. Jim was already there, watching Miss Stowe make buttonholes.

"How could you do it?" Mrs. Ford cried, with [illegible]. "The doctor says you did it right, and he couldn't have done it better, and Rob will only have to keep still a little to get well. Oh, I am so thankful, my dear girl! Where did you learn it?"

"My Grandfather Gorham was a doctor," said Miss Stowe, quietly overcasting; "and I used to drive about with him, and I saw him set dislocated limbs two or three times. It is simple enough just a jerk. I was sure I could do it, but it made me faint."

"Gorham?" said Mrs. Ford, forgetting dislocations. "My grandfather was a Gorham. I wonder if it's the same family? What was his name?"

"Andrew," said the dressmaker.

"And my grandfather had a cousin Andrew," cried Mrs. Ford, "in—"

"Fairfield, said Miss Stowe smiling.

"Yes, Fairfield," said Mrs. Ford, exulantly; and the lions in the centres of the coats-of-arms, still visible to her mental gaze, assumed a meek and vanquished mien. "Why we're cousins!"

"We're cousins," said Jim, and shook Miss Stowe's hand with an ardor disproportionate to the degree of kinship.

* * * * *

"Yes, she is a pretty girl," said Mrs. Ford, wheeling Rob about the lawn a week after the accident in his discarded baby carriage, and pausing to talk to Mrs. Sayles over the fedce. "She's lovely and so sweet tempered and bright! And you were right about Jim, too. He is in love with her already—dreadfully! He told me so. And of course she likes him. How can she help it? And they're to be married. She never encouraged Paul Ritter at all, do you know? She disliked him from the first. I asked her. And do you know that her mother was a Gorham, too, and we're distantly connected! We've the history of family for two hundred years back, and so we know what it is. We were so glad to discover it!"

"Indeed!" said Mrs. Sayles, in tones embittered by defeat and disappointment.

The Crisis at Waterloo.

All at once came the tragedy. To the left of the English and on our right, the head of the column of cuirassiers reared with a fearful clamor. Arrived on the ridge, wild, furious and running to the annihilation of the squares and cannon, the cuirassiers saw between them and the English a ditch—a grave. It was the sunken road of Ohain. It was a frightful moment. There was the ravine, unlooked for, gaping, before their very horses' feet two fathoms deep between its banks The second rank pushed in the first and the third pushed in the second. The horses reared, fell backward struggled with their feet in the air, heaping up and overturning their riders. There was no power to retreat; the whole column was but a projectile, the momentum gathered to crush the English, crushed the French. The pitiless ravine still gaped till it was filled, riders, horses, rolled in together pell mell, mangling each other, making common flesh in this gulf; and when the grave was full of living men, the rest rode on over them and passed on. Almost a third of Dubois' brigade plunged into this abyss.—World of Adventure.

In the country towns the circus comes one day and departs the next. In Chicago it stays a week, and then lots of people fail to get in to see it. Talk about country jays and circus lemonade! the city jays lay them all in the shade. After all, human nature is pretty much the same wherever you find it.—Arkansaw Traveler.

Little Romances.

From the Omaha, Nebr., Bee.]

The village of Winchester, W. Va. has been much stirred up over the the announcement of the marriage of Miss Nannie Petticord, an heiress. During a visit to Missouri last summer she won the affections of G. A. Goodman, of Hamilton. After her return home she kept up a correspondence with him, and their affection for each other soon grew into love and from love into an engagement. Invitations for their marriage in Winchester were issued and one of them was sent to Thomas Jackson, of Clare county, who was also one of Miss Petticord's suitors. On receiving the announcement he at once sought an interview with Miss Petticord, and between sobs and tears, told how he loved her, and that her marriage to another would kill him. This softened her heart, and she then and there consented to cancel the engagement with the Missourian. She wrote him that she had changed her mind and that she loved another. Goodman, on receiving the notice, took the first train, arriving at Winchester more than a week ago. He, too, sought an interview with Miss Petticord, and she promised to be his partner. Thinking he had everything his own way, Goodman went to his hotel, but Jackson called and made another more affecting appeal, and her mind was again changed. This was kept up for a week, first one and then the other being the victor. Pools were sold on the result, and nothing else was talked of in Winchester. One Sunday evening Goodman had an engagement to call, and, getting tired of the fickleness of the woman, concluded to take with him a minister and a license and settle the matter beyond recall. Imagine his chagrin to find that Jackson had called half an hour before, armed with a licence and minister, and when Goodman arrived he found that Jackson had won the prize.

The United States a Century Hence.

In the last number of Science, Quartermaster General Montgomery C. Meigs presents some wonderful figures as to the increase in the population of the United States during the next hundred years.

Raising his calculations upon our our past increase, Gen. Meigs concludes that 33.3 per cent. will be the rate of increase for every decade from now till 1990, and then the inhabitants of the United States will be 1,205,562,248, or five sixths as many as the present population of the world. In 1920, he gives us 159,000,000 and in 1950 he puts the population at 381,000,000. Between 1980 and 1990 he figures a gain of 302,000,000. Gen. Meigs expresses the utmost confidence that science will have so progressed that in 1990 the United States will be fully able to support not only this vast population, which will average 400 to the square mile, but even twice the number.

All this is sufficient to take away one's breath, yet who can say it will not all come to pass, and that a hundred years hence the United States will not be the home of a consolidated nation of the English speaking people of the world—the most intelligent, most industrious, richest, most powerful, the grandest nation on earth, out-weighing all the remainder of the world!

It is a fairy like picture that General Meigs paints of the future of the United States, but our history, progress and growth has been so remarkable in our short past that no one can afford to laugh at Gen. Meigs' picture.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON Sept., 20—The Pension office muddle still furnishes the republicans with worry and the democrats with amusement. The trouble seems to have been to find a representative G. A. R. man for the position of Commissioner who was willing to reverse the methods of Tanner in the conduct of the office. Ex Representative Warner of Missouri to whom the position was first offered, was rather inclined to accept, but after spending a night with President Harrison at Deer Park, and finding out what was expected of him, he declined and it was given out that he could not afford to give up his private business. The real reason was that he would not agree to conduct the office on any other method than that adopted by Tanner. Then the position was tendered to G. S. Merrill, of Massachusetts, and it is understood that he has accepted it with all the conditions imposed by President Harrison. Gen. Merrill is an ex-commander in chief of the G. A. R, but he is very conservative on the pension question and has always voted with the minority of that organization in opposing the proposed service pension. The present acting Commissioner of Pensions, acting it is supposed under orders from President Harrison, has revoked the orders of Tanner allowing all pensioners receiving less than $4 per month to be examined upon application for a rerating, and the one making the evidence of a single private sufficient to prove original disability. The administration has taken the back track on the pension question. In the mean time Tanner is waiting to receive the appointment of Recorder of Deeds for this District, which his friends claim was promised to him if he would resign, while the citizens here irrespective of party are up in arms against his getting this position which President Harrison has promised them should not be given to any one not a citizen of the District of Columbia. President Harrison's position is far from a bed of roses.

The white clerks in the navy pay division of the Fourth Auditors office are in a bad humor because Secretary Windom has appointed a negro chief of that division. Those who remain under him deserve no sympathy.

Tanner's friends are starting a movement to drive Secretary Noble out of the cabinet. They want ex Representative Goff of West Virginia, to succeed him. But Mr. Clarkson's friends will probably have something to say about that.

The Civil Service Commission has written a letter to the postmaster at Minneapolis scouring him for violating the law in making appointments in his office.

Representative Cutchings, of Mississippi, thinks that the only legislation of importance which will be passed at the coming session of Congress will be the repeal of the tobacco tax, and that can only be passed with the assistance of democratic votes.

Secretary Tracy is getting on very dangerous ground. He is considering the advisability of building the two 3,000 ton cruisers provided for by the last Congress in Government navy yards. Mr. Tracy means well, but if he escapes the political strikers he will do well. It does not require a very long memory to remember what attempting to build vessels in Government Navy Yards a few years ago cost the people. Better stick to the contract system.

Representative Bynum, of Indiana, expects a very lively session of Congress. He says: "We have a lot to worry the republicans about and we will be very apt to make it interesting for them."

Members and Senators are getting quite plentiful around Washington. They recognize that the session of Congress which begins in December will be a long one, how long no man is at present in a position to even make an intelligent guess, and they come early to make preparation for it. The absence of decided opinion on both sides as to what will or will not be done is very marked.

Judge Groff, of Nebraska, is the new Commissioner of the General Land office. His appointment was a great disappointment to a number of aspiring gentlemen.

Senator Sherman still lingers here, and there are people who say that Foraker would prefer his staying here. He fears the assistance of the Senator more than his absence and has not yet asked him to take any part in the Ohio campaign. Somebody must have been whispering something in the governor's ear.

A Good Result of the "Protective" Tariff.—One of the severest cyclones ever experienced visited a portion of the West the other day, but no property was destroyed. Eastern men held such heavy mortgages on all the farms in the neighborhood that the cyclone couldn't budge 'em.—Norristown Herald.

A "Northern settler" in Virginia writes as follows to the Philadelphia North American: "I am a Republican from away back to 1856, but no inducement could make me or my two sons vote Mahone's ticket. Of the 10,000 or 12,000 Northern men who have come here since 1865 not 500 will vote his ticket."

A Bustle factory in Connecticut has suspended. A change of fashion is sometimes a serious matter. In this instance three hundred girls are thrown out of employment. Nevertheless, we do not want to see the bustle fashion revived.

—The man who is in the habit of going to church to get up and leave after the sermon has commenced had better stay away if thats all he goes for.

—J. H. McClintic, of Warm Springs, Va.; C. G. McCorkle and wife and Mrs. Mary Wilson, of Rockbridge Co., Va., were guests at Hotel by Wagner, last Friday.

—The following persons were registered at Huntersville Hotel last week and this: Attorney Wm. M. McAlster and wife, of Warm Springs, Va.; A. F. and R. F. Wickline, of the G. V. Woolen Mills; A. W. Ladington, of Ronceverte and B. C. Hill, of Academy.

—Tuesday afternoon both Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Lockridge came near being drowned in Knapp's Creek. They were attempting to cross the stream in a buggy near the residence of Dr. Lockridge when the current capsized the buggy and carried them down the stream some distance, where they succeeded in getting ashore. Their escape was very narrow.

A Sad Death.

Tuesday afternoon, at about 1 o'clock, Newton Barkley, son of James Barkly, Sr., was drowned while attempting to cross Knapp's Creek in a boat. It seems that Randolph Harris (col.) had come to Mr. Barkleys mill just above Huntersville and, as the water had raised considerably while there, he asked Newton and [illegible] brother James to [illegible] across the Creek [illegible] The boys took Harris [illegible] but on their return lost [illegible] the boat and fearing they [illegible] carried over the mill dam [illegible] below them, the boys [illegible] jumped into the water, hoping [illegible] reach the bank. The strong current, however, rapidly carried them down over the dam, where with great difficulty James succeeded in getting out, but Newton was carried down the stream and lost.

At the time of going to press no trace had been found of his body. His death is a great shock to the family and community.

LATER.—The body has been found.

Hillsboro Happenings

Mr. Beverly Waugh lies in a critical condition at his home from the cancer on his face.

The 5th term of the Hillsboro M. & F. Academy, commenced this morning with Mr. Hankla of Va. as Principal and Miss Kate Guthrie of Smithville Va. as assistant. Messrs. Guy Slaven and Freddie Beard of Huntersville were enrolled as pupils.

Messrs. Wm. H. Overholt and Charlie Callison left this morning for Ronceverte to look after their lumber at that place.

A heavy frost greeted us Sunday morning and caught some fine corn not cut.

Mrs. S. E. Wickline, of Va., is visiting friends and relatives in the Levels and at Jacox.

Misses Fannie Williams and Mary Pickering of Falling Spring are visiting friends in the Levels.

The entertainment given by the Temperance Lodge last Friday night was a success and consisted of select reading by Misses Verdie Clark, Katie Marshall, Belle Eskridge. The Quarterly Review, a Temperance paper edited by Mr. E. H. Moore and Jennie R. Clark assistant editor, was read by Jennie Clark and followed by a dialogue. Wine as a medicine by Messrs Harry Campbell, Gus Eskridge and Will Wysong and Misses Belle Eskridge, Katie Marshall and Verdie Clark. This was a good dialogue and was well prepared. The music was furnished by Mr. E. H. Moore, and Misses Lillie Overholt, Mary I. McNeel, and Rose Shearer. Owing to a little misunderstanding a speech by Rev. Wm. E. Miller and one by the Worthy Patriarch was left off the progame. The stage was handsomely decorated with Hydrangea and ferns.

Dunmore Doings.

Quite a leaky day.

Died, at his home, near Green Bank, on Sunday 22nd inst., Frederick Phillips. I suppose he was at the time of his death, the oldest man in the county. He leaves a number of sons and daughters, friends and relatives to mourn his loss. Peace be unto his ashes.

Prof. Geo. E. Swecker, of Highland is out on a visit. He sold the St. Lawrence Boom & M'f'g. Co., one of the finest horses in the county.

Capt. E. A. Smith, lost a very fine horse this week.

Nathan Wallace lost his cow by a tree falling on her.

We still have lots of hooping cough.

Mrs. H. N. Moore, is not so well at this writing.

Mrs. Pitcher, of Pa., is registered at Hotel Wakeman for the winter.

B. M. Pritchard, and wife, of Hot Springs, Va., were here on a visit last week.

The thrashing machine is in our neighborhood finishing up for the season.

The Misses Ligon, of Clover Lick spent Saturday and Sunday with the Misses Siple.

Profs. O. W. Hackman and Geo. Beales assisted Prof. C. B. Swecker with the singing on Sunday last at Cross Road. The singing was largely attended. Singing every two weeks.

There will be a singing class organized at Baxter church on Sunday the 29, at 3, p. m. by Prof. C. B. Swecker, Miss Cora Jones and others. Come and bring your singing books.

Auctioneer C. B. Swecker has returned from the largest sale of personal property ever had in Randolph Co., and he says fine stock brought fine prices. Attorney C. F. Moore and R. B. Kerr, made the sale lively, and they both have some fine stock.

R. B. Kerr has done some excellent work on the Staunton and Parkersburg turnpike.

Swecker had a little chase across Cheat Mountain by a panther. They both squalled some, but we believe Swecker out squalled the panther. (Swecker should have that panther indicted for "crying" without lisence—Editor.)

Give us the news from all parts of the County.

Success to THE TIMES.

Mr. Frederick Phillips, who lived about seven miles above here, died on last Sunday morning at a very advanced age.

Mrs. Dr. Mooman has been quite unwell for some days, but, we are glad to learn, is now convalescent.

Sunday morning witnessed the first frost of the season in this community and it was a big one.

PAULINA.

Two Pendleton county farmers, named Rhodes and Anderson, were struck by lightning on Tuesday night of last week. Anderson was killed, while Rhodes injuries are considered fatal. The men were standing under a shed, whither they had gone to be out of the storm, and after being struck the building took fire and was consumed. Rhodes was badly burned before he could escape. Anderson's body was consumed in the building.

JOHN GORDON, in the employ of the Lake George Paper and Pulp Company, at Ticonderago, New York, fell asleep near the machinery. Two fellow workmen, it is said in a joke planned to scare him. They tied a rope about his feet and threw it over a shaft making 125 revolutions a minute. They could not cut the rope in time and Gordon was killed, the body being horribly mutilated. One of the perpetrators of the joke lost his reason from the shock.

The Atlanta Constitution says: It cannot be denied that there is more uneasiness in the South between the whites and blacks than has been known in twenty years.

Mrs. Robt. Ray Hamilton, gets two years in the N. Y. penitentiary for an atrocious assault on her nurse.

There have been several large failures in the wool trade, most of them, if not all, occurring where they were least expected. This result is considered remarkable, in view of the fact that protection has been maintained at the old standard. It is gradually becoming understood that the tariff is not the elixir of the life of trade, and that while it may protect the wool grower and the wool dealer, it affords no protection to the poor creditor.—Fur Trade Review.

Two Excuses.

When the Board of Trade of Chicago moved from the old business center there was a rush for the old offices vacated by the nabobs of commerce. After awhile, these new tenants found the high-priced rooms didn't pay, and sought all kinds of excuses to move.

Among these unfortunates were Stubbs and Stobbs. Each had rented an office,Stubbs in the basement Stobbs in the attic. When the renting agent come around, Mr. Stubbs announced his intention of moving.

"But you can't do it you know," said the agent.

"Why not?"

"We've got you on a year's lease."

"Well, I have reasons for abandoning the case."

"What reasons?"

"This basement room is damp. The glue in the desks got so moist they fell to pieces. The books are all moldy,and I've got rheumatism from it. I'd ought to sue you for damages."

The agent looked scared muttered something about "being sorry; move, of course, if you must," and went to see Mr. Stobbs.

Stobbs surprised him with a similar declaration of intention to move.

"What's your complaint?" growled the agent "Dampness here, too I suppose?"

"No, sir, just the reverse. Why, sir, the sun has blistered the floor till it's all out of plumb, my new desk is all scorched, and I've got no blood left, with the dry rot in this place."

"You got very badly deceived by two very shrewd men," a friend told the agent, a day or two later. "Those scamps got rich on those offices."

"How so? They said wet and dry——"

"Yes, Stubbs was in the basement next door to the saloon. Kept full all the time, and got so jovial that everybody liked him. Business boomed on account of his rare good-nature."

"And Stoobs?"

"He was dry—very dry. Basement saloon eight flights down. Kept sober for a month from necessity, reformed, and saved a farm in drinks in two weeks!"

What Woman can Do.

She can come to a conclusion without the slightest trouble of reasoning on it, and no sane man can do that.

Six of them can talk at once and get along first, rate, and no, two men can do that.

She can safely stick fifty pins in her dress while he is getting one under his thumb nail.

She is cool as a cucumber in half a dozen tight dresses and skirts while a man will sweat and fume and growl in one loose shirt.

She can talk as sweet as peaches and cream to the woman she hates while two men would be punching each other's head before they had exchanged ten words.

She can throw a stone with a curve that would be a fortune to a baseball pitcher.

"She can say "no" in such a low voice that it means "yes."

She can sharpen a lead pencil if you give her plenty of time and plenty of pencils.

She can dance all night in a pair of shoes two sizes too small for her and enjoy every minute of the time.

She can appreciate a kiss from her husband seventy-five years after the marriage ceremony is performed.

She can go to church and afterward tell you what every woman in the congregation had on, and in some rare instances can give you some faint idea of what the text was.

She can walk half the night with a colicky baby in her arms without once the desire of murdering the infant.

She can do more in a minute than a man can do in an hour, and do it better.

She can drive a man crazy for twenty four hours, and then bring him to paradise in two seconds by simply tickling him under the chin, and there does not live that mortal son of Adam's misery who can do it.—Boston Times.

Overhauling History.

The old story books made us believe that on April 20, 1775, Israel Putnam was plowing in his field, when a messenger arrived in hot haste with news of the battle of Lexington,and that the horo farmer unyoked his oxen and left them to their fate, mounted a horse and was off to the north without so much as saying "good-by" to those of his house.

And were we not brought up in the belief that this line—

They left the plowshare in the mold, was inspired especially by his case?

And have not we, all of us, ever since our childhood been familiar with pictures representing him plowing, clad in a frock as long as a nightgown, which no farmer could wear at any kind of work without imminent and unescapable peril of being tripped up at every step he took—to say nothing of turning a forrow, when he would be indeed fortunate if he did not find himself under the plowshare?

And to know that after many years that there was no plow in the vase—to find out that that, too, is a myth!

It was, indeed, the day after the fight at Lexington, in the morning, and Israel Putnam was at work on his farm in Pomfret, Conn. But he was building a stone wall, with his hired men; and he had on a leather frock and apron—the frock must have been a short one; fancy one of that material coming to his heels! He took off the apron, but did not wait to change the check shirt he had worn in the field, and was off without delay. He rode the same horse 100 miles in eighteen hours and reached Cambridge at sunrise the next morning.

"Mr Smithers," said his wife, "if I remember rightly, you have often said that you disliked to see a woman constantly getting herself into print."

Boys Should be Taught.

Not to tease girls or boys smaller than themselves.

When their play is over for the day, to wash their face and hands, brush their hair and spend the evening in the house.

Not to take the easiest chair in the room and put it directly in front of the fire, and forget to offer it to their mother when she comes to sit down.

To treat their mother as politely as if she were a strange lady who did not spend her life in their service.

To be kind and helpful to their sisters, as to other boys' sisters.

Not to grumble or refuse when asked to do some errand which must be done, and which otherwise takes the time of some one or other who has more to do than themthemselves.

To take pride in having their mothers and sisters for their best friends.

"To try to find some amusement for the evening that all the family can join in, large and small.

To take pride in being gentlemen at home.

To cultivate a cheerful temper.

To learn to sew on their own buttons.

"If they do anything wrong, to take their mothers into their confidence, and, above all, never to lie about anything they have done.

TIGER LILY.

A mid-summer moon was shining down on the uneven surface of the wild mountain plateau; the lights of the little settlement shone like yellow dots of flame, here and there. To-night the barracks—mere rude wooden enclosures they were as flimsily constructed as a child's card house—were in restless commotion, for the men were to break camp on the morrow.

Six months they had been stationed at Omayo. When first the straggling settlement sprang up around the mountain mine, whose hidden treasures had attracted the inhabitants, there had been trouble with the wandering Indians who haunted the slopes higher up—as much the fault of the whites as of the red men, it is but just to say.

But the United States protects its own, and a body of men were stationed at once at Omayo, until the settlement was strong enough figuratively speaking, to stand on its own feet. And now the emergency was over, and the soldiers had been ordered to a military post a hundred miles or so to the northwest.

Old Joe Jernigan sat smoking his pipe on the board platform in front of his "General Supply Store."

All the evening it had been full of customers, but now, as the hands of the wooden clock neared the figure nine, he was at liberty to come out to his splint chair and smoke his pipe and stare at the moon, while Captain Irving Ismay sat on the cracker barrel inside and talked with Lily.

Lily was Jernigan's niece and bookkeeper, and in addition to this the very apple of his eye—a tall, dusky-eyed, handsome girl, with a pearly complexion, and hair full of bronze glints and gleams.

"Tiger Lily" the miners called her, sometimes in reference to the fine spirit of her own that she had, and a self-assertion which she was very apt to show if once she suspected that any of them were not treating her with due respect.

Lily was adding up the books for the day. (Old Joe was no scholar, and knew nothing of bookkeeping by double entry. "The gal knows enough for us both," he was wont to say, with a certain pride, as he looked toward the wooden railed desk where she wrote down the various items of sale and barter with an eagle's quill pen, dipped in ink made of pokeberry juice.) And Captain Ismay was bidding her good by.

"She'll miss him, likely, will Lily," said Joe to himself, still staring steadfastly up at the moon. "He's been a deal o' company for her. It ain't as if she could bring herself to associate with every fellow at the Omayo Mines, for Lily always was particular. But then a hundred miles or so do 't count for much out here, and if he asks permission to come and see her once in a while I shan't say no. My poor little Tiger Lily! I brought her out here because there didn't seem no place to leave her in the State of Varmount, and she's been rare and useful to me, there's no denyin' that. But it's a lonesome place for a gal to come to; yes, it is. And the Captain's a fine fellow, but he ain't no handsomer for a man than Lily is for a gal. So fur's I can see, I shall be the only man who will be a loser by the bargain. Eh? Is that you, Reuben Dorsay? Set down a spell. No, we ain't shut up yet, but the pool leg's been gone twenty minutes and more."

"Gone, eh?" said Reuben Dorsay, the young foreman of the force now employed in establishing telegraphic communications between Omayo and Center City. "Well, it's no great matter. To-morrow will do very well. Nice night, Jernigan, isn't it?"

"Yes."

The old man smoked on.

"The military division is getting ready to move to-morrow."

"So I'm told."

"The captain's inside, isn't he, talking to Lily?"

Jernigan nodded without removing his pipe from his mouth.

Dorsay half rose, then sat down again.

"Well," said he, "I guess I won't disturb them."

Jernigan answered only by a sort of sly chuckle.

"A nice man, that young Ismay?"

Once more old Joe nodded.

"They'll get more civilized quarters, I've heard, at Morton's Pass," observed Dorsay, leaning back against the cedar post that formed one of the columns of the rude portico. "Ismay's wife is to meet him there."

"Ismay's which?"

"His wife. From Sacramento City. Didn't you know he was married to old General Purviance's daughter? A runaway match, two years ago. Quite a romantic story!"

"No, said Joe Jernigan, "I never heard it."

Dorsay talked a little longer, but old Joe paid no sort of attention to his words. He did not even know when the young foreman went away.

"Ismay's wife!" he kept repeating to himself—"Ismay's wife! What will Lily say—poor Lily!—when she knows it? By gum! I've a mind to pitch the fellow down into the gulley when he comes out! What business has a married man lurking around here, talking nonsense to the girls? But he'll find it won't pay to fool with my Tiger Lily! No, that it won't!"

Captain Ismay went away presently, with a careless, good-humored adieu.

The old man glared at him as he departed, with red, savage eyes like those of a Spanish bull who faces the matador.

The moment he had vanished behind the madrona thickets Jernigan sprang up and made for the solitary road by a short cut which would be sure to intercept the wayfarer some quarter of a mile below.

In his hand he grasped his open jack knife; his heart beat like a muffled drum.

"My Tiger Lily!" he kept repeating to himself; "my own little ewe lamb! There's but one way to deal with the scoundrel who comes here to make a football of her heart. No captain in all the United States army can do that, and hope to escape alive!"

He stood there waiting, but Ismay did not come that way.

"I'm baffled for once," Jernigan muttered. "He has taken the Redwood road this time. No matter! I'll hunt him down yet. He's to be in the place twelve hours longer. They'll have to detail another captain for duty at Morton's Pass, that's all. I shall hear him when he comes down past the Echo Rock and I shall be ready for him!"

He returned slowly—still drawing his breath quick and fast—to the wooden platform all steeped in moonlight, and sat down once more in the old splint chair.

Inside the store he could hear Lily's light steps moving around, as she locked the cash drawer and put the ledger and day-book away.

As she did so, she hummed a snatch of some tune. The sound went to old Joe's heart.

Poor child! how innocently happy she was!

In a minute or so she came out into the clear white moonshine.

"Well, Uncle Joe!" she said gaily.

"Well, my lass!"

The words were almost like a groan.

She sat down beside him, leaning her head against his arm.

He stroked down the bronze, gleaming hair with a dumb strength of longing tenderness in his heart.

Her cheeks were unwontedly red; her dark eyes sparkled beneath their long lashes.

"How shall I tell her?" thought the old man. "My pet lamb, that I wouldn't hurt for a king's ransom! I never was one to pick and choose my words, like a preacher or a lawyer. But she'd ought to know—yes, she'd ought to know!"

"Uncle Joe!" said Lily, after a moment or two of silence.

"Yes, my girl!"

"There—there's something I want to tell you."

"Is there, Lily?"

His heart sank within him. Was it coming now?

"You won't be vexed, Uncle Joe?" she said, nestling her head close against his arm.

"I—vexed with you, my girl? That ain't up-and-down likely, is it? But I've done wrong, Lily—I've forgot that a great rough man like me ain't the sort to look after a tender chick like you. I should 'a watched closer, Lily—that's what I should have done."

"What should you say, uncle," whispered Lily, "if—if I am to get married and leave you?"

"To—get married, Lily?"

"Haven't you suspected this, uncle, of late?"

"Yes, I have," said he, "but, oh, Lily, is your heart very much in this?"

"Uncle!"

"Has he asked you to marry him, Lily?"

"Yes, uncle."

"Then"—the old man flung his clay pipe down upon the ground, where it broke into a score of fragments, and muttered a deep execration under his breath—"he's a villian, that's all."

"Uncle!" cried out the girl.

"And a doubled dyed one at that!" said the excited old man. "Lily! Lily! he has a wife already at Morton's Pass! He's going to her now."

Lily had lifted her head and looked earnestly at her uncle.

"But uncle, he isn't going to Morton's Pass."

"Yes, he is—to-morrow. And I wish he'd fallen dead before he ever came to Omayo with his epaulettes and his jingling spurs, and his false, handsome face!"

"Uncle!" cried Lily, "whom are you talking about?"

"About Captain Ismay, to be sure."

"But what has Captain Ismay to do with it?"

"Everything, hasn't he?"

Lily knit her pretty brows in a puzzled fashion.

"Nothing at all," said she, "except that he's been an excellent friend to Reuben, and we're both ever so much obliged to him. Only think uncle—he's got the contract for Reuben to be chief electrical engineer at North Marino in the new works there, and whenever you can spare me uncle—"

"Reuben!" burst out Joe Jernigan.

"Yes, to be sure—Reuben Dorsay. We've been engaged a long time now. Do you mean, you dear, darling, stupid old uncle, that you never suspected this?"

"Never!" said Uncle Joe, smiting his knee with his fist. "But look here, Tiger Lily, do you love him?"

"Yes, Uncle Joe."

"And he loves you?"

"Of course he does."

"Then," said the old man, "I haven't a word of objection. I shall be awful lonesome without you, but as long as you're both happy, why, it's all right."

"And as he kissed her forehead, she thought she felt the touch of a teardrop on her brow.

"But it can't be possible," said Tiger Lily, to herself, "because who ever heard of Uncle Joe shedding a tear."

But Tiger Lily did not know that this tear was not one of grief, but rather of thankfulness that there was no bloodguiltiness on his hands.

THERE is not a man, woman or child living who will ever date a letter or document without using the figure 9, if the date of the document is made complete. Why not? See. The 9 has come to stay many years. It is now on the right—1889. Next year it will move a step to the left—1890, stay there ten years and then take another step to the left—1900, and there will remain until you are done dating letters.

"Say, doctor," he remarked, strolling into the office, "what do you suppose is the matter with me?"

"What are your symptoms?" asked the M. D.

"Well, I have a great tendency to sit still, and let my wife bustle around the house. Again, in winter, I don't seem to feel like getting up and making the fire."

"You have a bad attack of inertia," said the doctor, "superinduced by a liver trouble. You must be very careful."

"Then it ain't laziness?"

"Of course not."

"By George, then, I hope it will last."

Young Fitzpeter (waiting for Miss Gusher to come down, to Johnny)—"Your sister has some very pretty flowers in the bay window, Johnny."

Johnny (who is always around)—"Now your talking, mister. She told Miss Bustler, yesterday, that she'd like to add you to the collection."

Fitzpeter (delighted)—"Ah, how clever! What sort of a flower did she propose to call me?"

"A monkey plant."

When Miss Gusher comes home to receive her caller, Johnny is alone trying to tack the cat's tail to the floor.

Aunt Keziah (severely)—"So you're going to try the experiment of reforming young [illegible] after marriage. Is he worth reforming?"

Kittie (tearfully)—"Well, he's worth a million."

Sam Johnson happened to pay a visit to the county jail a few days ago, and who should he see inside of the bars but Gabe Snodgrass.

"How in de worl' Gabe, did yer git in dar?" asked Sam Johnson.

"I don't bodder my head 'bout dat ar, how I got in heah. How to git out ob heah is what I want's to talk about."

The Democratic Idea.

The difference between the Democratic and Republican parties on the question of taxation is not a difference between 47 and 40 per cent., which is a mere matter of detail, not a question between a prohibitory tariff on one side and free trade on the other, which is a mere academic discussion, of no interest to practical men. But it is a difference that lies at the very root of all government, a question upon which it depends whether our Government shall be of the people, for the people, and by the people, or a Government of all the people by a very few of the people for an extremely limited class of the people. The Republican party says that taxes are blessings, and the more the people of a nation are taxed individually, the more prosperous the nation is as a whole. The Democratic party declares that taxes are burdens, and the less we have of them the better, and that the idea of enriching the whole community by taking property in minute quantities from a great many people and giving it to a few people is simple rubbish. Sixty million dollars in one man's pocket is a very imposing evidence of his prosperity, but the nation would be better off if each one of 60,000,000 people had a dollar in his pocket, although it is true that the $60,000,000 would not make much show when divided up. Undoubtedly it makes money circulate to take it out of one pocket and put it into the other, but that doesn't make the whole amount any greater. And so it makes it circulate to take it from one man and give it to another, but the process does not bless the man it is taken from.—National Democrat.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON Sept., 27.—President Harrison returned to the White House to-day for the season, and once more that historic residence becomes the Mecca towards which all office-seekers wend their way. He will not lack for companionship or occupation for some time. It is stated semi-officially that the first question to be decided will be the appointment of a Commissioner of Pensions. Senator Sherman is trying to get the place for Ex-Representative Brown of his State. It is said that he told President Harrison that his removal of Tanner was raising Cain among the republicans in Ohio and unless Brown was appointed the democrats would certainly carry the State. No doubt Mr. Sherman told President Harrison that, in hopes of getting his friend appointed, but among those who know Mr. Sherman best it is not believed that he will shed any tears over the defeat of Foraker in Ohio.

The silver question is going to be a troublesome one for this administration. The trouble about this question is that what pleases the east does not please the west, and vice versa.

For some reason the idea is entertained among those who ought to know that Frank Hatton, editor of the Washington Post, speaks through that paper on many important public matters for the administration. It is certain that he refused to print in his paper signed communications from republicans criticising President Harrison for removing Tanner, and that the editorial columns of the Post have let that subject severely alone. Looking at the thing from this standpoint Hatton's attack on the civil service law, which has just broken out again in a most violent form is most significant.

Senator Quay who was here one day this week, is understood to have expressed a very uncomplimentary opinion of the administration which he did so much to bring into office.

"Mum," is the word at the Pension office these days. The only talking around the building is done by the attorneys who find it almost impossible to do any business there on account of the tangle in which everything is in. The new Commissioner has a herculean task before him, one that I would not undertake were the salary four times what it is.

Everything is in readiness for the meeting here next week of the Three America's Congress, which will really be only the precursor of the great American Exposition to be held in Washington in 1892.

This administration is very careful in some things. For instance, it sent Fred Douglass minister to Hayti from Washington to Fortress Monroe on a Government vessel for fear that the Potomac river steamboats would refuse to furnish him and his white wife with first-class accomodations, and that Fred would raise a big row in consequence thereof. That's what I call diplomacy, but it was rather expensive all the same.

The great conclave of Knight Templars to assemble here early in October will find Washington at its prettiest, and they will be so treated that every man of them will become an earnest advocate of this city as the proper place for the World's Exposition of 1892.

More than one democratic member of Congress has expressed to your correspondent the opinion that the republicans will make no serious attempt to pass a tariff bill at the coming session of Congress. They are afraid of the subject. They know from past experience that it is loaded.

Tanner's letter to private Dalzell printed here this week has proved a veritable bombshell in the administrative camp. Its veracity is a course denied, but most people believe it to be genuine.

Civil Service Commissioner Roosevelt says it will be party treachery for a republican to introduce a bill in Congress for the repeal of the civil service law, or to attack that law. If this be treachery several members of the House are, to my certain knowledge, preparing to be traitors to the party. But as Mr. Roosevelt draws a salary of $7,000 a year, besides liberal travelling expenses, under that law, it may be considered by many people that he is prejudiced.

Dr. Kimball, Director of the Mint, and Col. Switzler, Chief of the Bureau of statistics, have both resigned to take effect October 15. They were appointees of the Cleveland administration, and their places were wanted for republicans.

The Navy department has decided to build the two 3,000 ton cruisers at Government Navy Yards. Now keep your weather eye on the yards they go to, and their effect on local politics.

Died, At his home near Hillsboro last Friday of cancer, Mr. B. H. Waugh. Mr. Waugh was converted and joined the M. E. Church in 1841, and was 67 years old at the time of his death. Mr. Waugh was a faithful earnest christian and departed this life with bright prospects of Heaven. We extend our sympathies to his bereaved widow and two children. May they remember a tie is binding them to that other world which was not, a short time ago. There is a hand that will beckon, a gentle voice that will be calling in softest tones "I am waiting for thee." May it brighten their dark days, and may they realize as he dons the robes of spotless white, the host which stand waiting about the pearly gates of glory, burst into song as of that morning of old, when the morning stars sang jubilee and the heavenly wings met beneath his released spirit and wafted it within, and may their hearts softly echo: "All is Well."

Sept. 26. PRUNELLA.

Some man went to the house of Mrs. Catherine Stows, an old widow lady eighty years old, living in Moore county, N. C. There was no one at the house but Mrs. Stows and her servant, Bettie Johnson, an old colored woman. The man rapped at the door and asked to be admitted inside. He was told to go away, no company could be entertained as there was no man at the house. He, however, broke down the door and shot the colored woman, and then with pistol in hand went into Mrs. Stows' room and demanded her money, threatening to kill her if she refused. When told there was no money in the house the burglar jumped upon the helpless woman and terribly beat her with a pistol.

Goff's Subsidence.

N. Y. Times.]

The best evidence that the final declaration of the result of the State election in West Virginia was in accordance with the facts and the law is the way which General Goff, the Republican candidate for Governor, has subsided after the loud and belligerent declarations of last winter. He has been busying himself with the dispensing of patronage in his State while waiting for the "good things" which the Administration is supposed to have in store for him personally. In fact, he has been allowed to have his way to such an extent in disposing of offices in West Virginia that "Steve" Elkins is dissatisfied. Goff himself did not fall outside the breastworks while leading an attack which carried them for the President; but he is a pushing person who expects, all the same, to be provided for, and the only difficulty seems to be to find something big enough to meet his expectations. If Partner Miller should go on the Supreme Bench, he thinks the place of Attorney General would about fit his case, and perhaps that is what he is waiting for.

OLD ROCK.

On the eve of their bridal day Jessie Glenn and John Marcus had their first quarrel. It was not a very fierce one, but it proved that such a thing could be between them and was not pleasant. Besides, it was a terrible time for such a thing. It began by Jessie asking John what he was going to do with Rock a big black dog he was very fond of.

"Do with him?" said John. "Why just what I always have—spoil him, I suppose."

"You don't mean to keep him, do you?" said Jessie. "You'll sell him."

"Sell Rock!" cried John. "Why, it would seem like selling your baby or your grandfather. He's been my friend for years—slept under my bed, followed me to work, shared my lunch. Why, I had him when I was a poor, motherless boy. Dad used to kick us out together. Many's the time, when he'd been drinking, and we'd cuddle up together for warmth in some area. Now I'm comfortable, I shan't kick Rock out. No, indeed. I couldn't."

"I hate dogs," said Jessie.

"Well, you've got to learn to love Old Rock," said John, laughing. "Love me, love my dog, and in this case; so you've got to, you see."

"I've got to!" cried Jessie, indignantly. "Ordering me like that already, when I refused Sam Williams for your sake, as well you know, John."

"Well," said John, "I always supposed that was because you liked me best, not out of self-sacrifice."

"At least" said Jessie, "he didn't keep a dog of that sort, and he was on his knees to me almost. Oh, dear! I don't think you care about me, John. I read a novel the other day, and in it the young man roasted a favorite falcon for his lady love's dinner, and never minded that all, he was so devoted to her."

"If I was to roast Old Rock, he'd be too much dinner for a regiment," said John, "and I'll bet you wouldn't take a bite of him. Do you want me to show my affection for you by carrying him to the sausage-makers and having him put up into bologna for winter use?"

This was not gallant, and naturally Jessie was displeased, as one may presume. They were not fashionable people. She was an honest, pretty, little factory girl. He a young plumber. But they have been very much in love with each other. This was a dash of cold water to both. They felt the impropriety of a squabble at this time and parted with a kiss, as usual; but the thought rankled in each mind.

Jessie thought of it as she made ready for her wedding, and as her friends looked at her new things. She had a pretty floor not far off, ready furnished for her, and things were all very nice, in a plain way. But what happiness could she expect if he was so cross about a little thing? And then to have ugly, black Rock, with his muddy feet, his way of snoring aloud and showing his tongue in gapes, always lying about. It was not a pleasant thought for the day before a wedding.

Meanwhile, the day wore on; the guests came. The bride was dressed. The minister arrived with his old wife. Everybody had come but the bridegroom and his best man.

The bridesmaids left the room and whispered in the little passage. The clock hands pointed to the hour for the ceremony. John had not come. Jessie tried to sit still to smile, to laugh and talk but she kept saying to herself: "What keeps him? Could he really have been angry? Could it be possible that he meant to break with her in this dreadful manner just about Old Rock?" She listened—the bell rang. Had he come? No! It was only the best man, alone. He reported that he had waited for John, and that he had not been home to supper. His wedding suit was spread on his bed, but there was no sign of John.

"I didn't know but he might be here," said the young man, looking about. But John was not there.

In her own room the bride wept and women came and went trying to comfort her. They lingered late. Eleven, twelve, one o'clock saw the minister still sitting in the great chair in the parlor, ready to marry John if he came, but though the bride's friends flew about the city and inquired everywhere, there was no news of the missing bridegroom.

That he had left her in wrath was Jessie's explanation of the matter; and it was she who at last declared that people had better go home, for that she would not marry John if he came on his bended knees to ask pardon.

Meanwhile the missing bridegroom had gone to work as usual, expecting, as it was Saturday, to get off earlier than usual, and had been pleased that he finished his work at four o'clock; but coming in eager to ask leave to go home, he found all in a commotion. A gas pipe had burst in a public building, where there was danger of leaving it unrepaired very long, and only one other man was in the place—Sam Williams, his old rival.

"You too must go," said the proprietor, waving his hands about. "I know it is hard, John; but Sam can bring the furnace and tools in, and you can get straight home. You have time, and you shall be paid for overwork, both of you, and I'll send a present to the bride on Monday. This is a necessary job, or I'd let you off."

John did not grumble, though he felt irritated. He hurried off as fast as he could, followed by Williams. The men did not like each other, and Williams was still jealous.

They spoke very little. Old Rock followed at John's heels and crouched out-side the building, when he was locked out, as usual.

The men's work took them down into the cellar, and into some great vaults there. They worked without any more talk than was necessary, and at last the job was done.

Williams had tested the leak at his part of the work and was about to call to John, whose light shone at the other end of the dark cellar, when suddenly the light went out. There was a crash, a cry. Williams did not know what had happened, but judged that a great beam that had been lifted out of place had fallen. He waited; there was silence. And now having the opportunity, the demoniac spirit of revenge asserted itself. He would not have planned to kill his rival, but he thought with joy that some bad accident had happened to him. He thought, too, that it was not his work, and that he was not called upon to alter it. If John was dead Jessie would be free again. Then he said to himself with Satan's sophistry:

"How do I know anything has happened? John has gone home, banging the door after him. That's all. A fine way to go off and leave a fellow," he said aloud; and gathered up the furnace and bag of tools and went his way locking all the doors behind him, and leaving the keys with the person who had charge of them, saying that his mate had gone off without a good-bye, leaving him alone in the cellar.

"Queer I never saw him," said the old man; but Sam did not relent. He took a night train out of town to spend Sunday at his mothers in the country and be out of the way of questions.

And this is how John did not come to his own wedding. He lay in the cellar hardly conscious, unable to lift the beam from his leg, and in a sort of dream, thinking of his Jessie and seeming to hear Old Rock's voice somewhere.

The poor girl arose wretched, and quite sure that John had jilted her. She never thought of any accident. As she sat at her late breakfast, trying not to show her grief and shame, and wondering how she should go home and face the girls, something pushed at the door.

The mother opened it, and the dog she hated so, Old Rock himself, walked in. He looked forlorn and hungry, his coat covered with mud, his eyes red, his appearance miserably hideous, his manners, too, had altered for the worse, for instead of galloping playfully about, striving to lick Jessie's face and wagging his tail, as usual, he sat down on his hind legs and began at once to deliver a series of those piteous howls with which his species are supposed by the superstitious to celebrate the departure of an immortal soul from this vale of tears.

At this, a sudden revulsion took place in Jessie's feelings, and with a wild scream she uttered her conviction that John was dead, and that the dog knew it.

In this the family coincided to an indivividual. Then the dog began to pull at Jessie's flounces.

"We have had our doubts, we have had our doubts," groaned the father. "John's not a man to jilt a girl that way, quarrel or no quarrel."

"And the dog just says it plain as words," sobbed the mother. "When my grandfather was drowned his dog came home just like that. Oh, poor John! You'll never see him no more, child, never no more!"

Meanwhile, the dog pulled and howled harder than ever.

"Silence, there," cried the old grandmother, from the cosy corner, where she was breaking her bread into a bowl of coffee. "Mebbee the parted sperit came along with the dog. The creeter is going to lead you to the body. Stop your cryin', an' go. Follow him. He knows better than you, for John's along of him. Go."

With her blood curdling in her veins, Jessie obeyed. She tied on her hat, and buttoned herself into a sacque, and went down the stairs and out into the streets, with the Sabbath stillness upon them. It was not easy to keep peace with Old Rock along the pavements; but she did so, and at last stopped with him before a great, empty-looking public building. Here the dog burrowed at a grating, and began to howl again.

It was more than Jessie could stand. She burst into bitter tears and was obliged to sit down on the sidewalk and hide her face in her hands.

"Is he down there, Rock?" she sobbed. And Rock wagged a "Yes" with his queer, bushy tail.

Then Jessie went to work. A policeman, kindly disposed; an old man with a bunch of keys; much talk a disclosure of the fact that plumbers were down cellar late Saturday afternoon, led at last to a descent into the cellar, where Old Rock, in a state of delight past all bounds, led to the spot where John lay, with a broken leg and bruised arm, but conscious and not fatally injured; and when she was sure of this, Jessie took Old Rock's head in both her hands, and kissed it fondly over and over again.

"You told me I'd have to love him, and it's come true; and he's brought us together, and as long as he lives he shall be as dear to me as he is to you. There, now!"

It was some time before they were married, but there was no more quarreling; and Jessie and John are a very happy couple. It is reported of Old Rock that the first time he met Sam Williams he bit him; and that, Jessie declares, is a proof that Sam knew all about John's being in the cellar, though he swears he did not.

Last evening two youths, each about 14, met in the street, when the following dialogue took place:

"I say, Bill, got my knife."

"No, I ain't."

"'Pon your word?"

"'Pon me word."

"'Pon your soul?"

"'Pon me soul."

"Hope you may die if you have?"

"Hope I may die if I have?"

"You ain't got my knife?"

"I ain't got your knife."

The querist seemed to be incredulous, but was on the point of giving it up in despair when a bright idea occurred to him, and he returned to attack with:

"'Pon your honor?"

"Oh," said the other, "now you touch me honor; take your darned old knife," and he handed the article over.

"Well done, Bill," said his chum, "I allus knowed you was a honorable chap."

A burglar who had been arrested while in the act of breaking into a bank pleaded guilty to the charge when arrested in Court, but claimed extenuating circumstances.

"What possible excuse can you present to mitigate this offense?" asked the Court.

"My lord, had I succeeded in getting my hands on the cash it would have removed temptation from the path of the cashier."

"H'm said the Judge, after mature reflection. "I see the point, which is well taken. I'll let you off on about three years."

Moral—If you can steal a man's horse it may save his hostler from going to State prison.

McCorkle—"And so you're engaged, McNichol. Do tell us all about it?"

McNichol—"Yes, it's a go this time You see, Isabella and I were out on the beach."

McCorkle—"Yes."

McNichol—"And the mosquitoes were very thick—"

McCorkle—"Yes."

McNichol—"And I wanted to get in."

McCorkle—"Yes."

McNichol—"And Isabella for some reason wanted to stay out."

McCorkle—"Yes."

McNichol—"That's all. It was propose or be eaten by mosquitoes, so I proposed."

Huntersville, W. Va.

October 10, 1889.

Next year the modest, retiring North Pole is to be the object of another search, involving expense and possible loss of life. Dr. Nansen, a Norwegian, is going for it this time.

Mrs. Philip H. Sheridan and her children are living at the cottge in Nonquitt, Mass., in which the General died. Mrs Sheridan has entirely recovered her health and strength.

John I. Blair, the New Jersey railroad magnate, who confesses to a fortune of $40,000,000, earned his first dollar by walking to Easton and back, a distance of twenty five miles, to sell a lot of rabbit skins.

A process has been invented by means of which photographs can be printed almost as fast as newspapers, and without dependence on sun or light. They are said to be of the first quality. That of course would make photographs much cheaper.

There is a woman in Milwaukee who is the mother of nine children. Not one of them were named until it was twelve years old. They were simply called by their nicknames and their numbers, "One," "Two," etc. As each one became twelve years old he chose his own name and was baptized.

Johnstown, Pa., which was devastated by flood some months ago is forging ahead, and will soon have in operation a number of large industries, employing 5,000 or 6,000 workmen, and pay out between $100,000 and $200,000 each week in wages. The steel works of the Carnegies are being rebuilt and enlarged, costly residences are being rebuilt and business houses are being completed and plans matured for a much more extensive city than it was before the waters swept it away.

A Monument to Columbus, erected by a Frenchman, and the only one in America, has remained in obscurity in Baltimore for more than a hundred years. It is now likely to come into prominent notice. New York will probably get up a magnificent Exposition in honor of the discoverer of America; but well is it, perhaps, that the considerate Frenchman did not leave the monument enterprise to that city.

Why is It.

The editor of the Catlettsburg Democrat, Captain Thomas D. Marcum, late of the Union Army, has asked the question, "Why is it?" and comments as follows:

"Why is it that most of the ex-Confederates are stout and well preserved men for their age, while most of the ex-Union soldiers are broken down from their service and are on the pension rolls or trying to get there. It is a fact that none will dispute that the Confederate army was not as well fed nor clothed as Union soldiers were; that they were physically more exposed than were the Union troops, yet most all of the ex-Union soldiers claim to be suffering from injuries and disease from their service, while the Confeds are robust and look as though they would be able for several years' good service in the field were it required of them. However, there are many who believe that the ex-Union soldier would be stouter and more robust and prosperous in the various avocations of life if there were no pensions attachment to alleged disability incurred while in the service. It seems to be more trying on a man's constitution to be loyal to the Government than it was to be a Rebel. Some how there is something about the matter that needs explanation."

WASHINGTON LETTER

WASHINGTON Oct., 4.—The Cabinet meeting held to-day was a little strong Pension affairs raised a small cyclone, and before that had passed away the vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court brought about a hurricane. At least two members are bitterly opposed to the appointment of Attorney General Miller, which President Harrison seems determined upon. It must have been a rather embarrassing position for Mr. Miller, who was present.

President Harrison is still wrestling with the problem of tryi g to find a man for Pension Commissioner who can satisfy the applicants for pensions without creating a financial deficiency. The thing is impossible, but of course its none of our business, if the administration wants to wear itself out in that way let it go ahead. The latest man named as likely to have an opportunity of declining to occupy Corporal Tanner's shoes is Ex-Gov. Hartranft, of Pennsylvania. Two men stand ready to occupy the position, Brown, of Ohio, and Campbell, of Kansas, but their readiness makes President Harrison shy of them.

Mr. Blaine is at last President, not of the United States, but of the Three America's Congress. He was elected to the position Wednesday when the Congress met and organized. Ex-Senator Henderson of Missouri was elected President protempore. Mr. Blaine's speech of welcome to the members of the Congress was a model of its kind, and is highly praised here by members of both parties. Immediately after adjourning to November 18, the Congress called on the President with whom the members took lunch. Thursday morning they left on a special train for a tour of the North East and West. They are certain to be impressed by what they will see and will return to Washington prepared to discuss more intelligently the matters brought before them. It is thought at the State department that the Congress will sit about three months.

Democrats here express considerable disappointment over the result of the elections in the new states. They had been led to expect something different. Secretary Tracy's difficulty in getting a Naval officer to command the Kearsage, which started from New York Tuesday for Hayti with Fred Douglass, our minister to that country as a passenger, has been the subject of a great deal of joking around Washington this week. As soon as it was known that the commanders cabin had to be given up to Fred, nobody who knows the personal habits of that individual blamed the Naval officers for getting out of the dilemma in any way possible. Secretary Tracy got very mad, but all the same I'll bet a big red apple Tracy would not entertain Douglass five or six days at his private residence for a years salary. Douglass is a very brainy man, but he is a negro for all that, and no white man who respects himself will care to be closely associated with him in a social way. I am inclined to believe with the Kentuckian that "there's as much in the blood of people as of horses."

Ex-Representative Harris, of Virginia, who has just made a trip through that state, says the democrats will have a walk over, and that Mahone will never again be heard from politically. I have it on good authority that several members of the administration have given up all hope of Mahone's election.

Senator's Hampton, of South Carolina, and Harris, of Tennessee are very wide apart in their ideas of a correct solution of the race problem. Senator Hampton has for a long time advocated the purchase of land in Mexico, or of an island, and the colonization thereon of the negroes of the Southern states. Senator Harris being asked what he thought of such a scheme replied: "I do not consider it practical at all. The negro doesn't want to be colonized, and if the devil only had those who are trying to make practical capital out of him there would be no trouble to speak about." Senator Harris is one of the large number who believe that the business of Congress has grown to such dimensions that continuous sessions ought to be held.

Representative Breckenridge, of Arkansas, thinks all the republican talk about the Rules of the House is intended to work the courage of the weakened republicans up to the point of seating all eighteen of the republican contestants.

Charges have been filed at the department of state against Reed Lewis, of Pennsylvania, consul agent at Morocco. He is accused of having attempted to extort a large sum of money from a vice consul as the price of his retention in office. Mr. Reed is one of President Harrisons appointments.

The Knight Templars are beginning to arrive for the Conclave. They will remain here ten days.

A Horrible Double Murder.

On the 4th inst., Felix Kamp, living near Charleston, went to his house, and having missed some articles he went to a cabin about a quarter of a mile away, where his daughter Mary aged 20 and his son aged 18 lived and accused the girl of having stolen some "flat irons" from his house. The old man became violently angry and when the daughter denied taking the irons he drew a two edged derk from his belt and assaulted her. He stabbed the girl several times, once in the stomach and once the abdomen. The boy who was eating his supper with his sister jumped and grabbed his father in order to prevent the murder of his sister, when the enraged father plunged the knife into his son's abdomen, letting out his bowels and cutting them in several places. They both died the next morning. The father is in jail.

The Edray District Institute will meet at Edray school house Oct. 19. Teachers and patrons from all parts of the County are cordially invited.

It Will, Indeed.

Kansas City Times.]

The Republican party has upset the faithful business system of Mr. Cleveland's administration. It has swung into its old habit of robbing the Treasury for class bribery. It has committed the financial crime of making a deficit in the Treasury accounts, something which the present generation regarded as impossible with our enormous revenue. Expose these blunders and crimes before 10,000 people and the widening wave of indignation will sweep the robber party out of any semblance of ascendenty it may have in that region.

Old Judge Jere Black was once asked to join the Republican party and said he: "You Republicans are a fine lot of fellows for all the purposes of this world—for power and plunder and good fellowship it is the best party that could be created. If I was quite sure that there is no future state of rewards and punishments I would join you instantly. Nothing but the fear of hell deters me."

Tramp—"Thankee kindly, mum; I'd no hope gettin sich a fine supper to day, mum. May heaven bless ye!"

Housekeeper—"As you've had a good supper, I think you might chop some wood."

"Yes, mum; but you know the old adage: 'After dinner rest a while; after supper walk a mile.' I'll walk the mile first, mum."

"Hear the news from down below?" "No. What?" "A lady down there near Santa Cruz, unaided and alone, held up an entire train." "What nerve. Who was she?" "A San Francisco belle. She wanted to cross the dusty road and held it up to keep it clean."

"That was a brave act of yours in stopping the runaway horse, young man. Here's a hundred dollar bill for you."

"That's a good deal of money for me."

"Nonsense. When a man saves my life I believe in paying him what it is worth."

Mrs. Brown—"Why is it, my dear that you will never sit on this side of the room when a gentleman calls?"

Cora—"Because, ma, my foot makes a shadow on the wall and it magnifies so."

Poet—"I have a few verses here, sir, which I should——,"

Editor—"Certainly. Will you kindly drop them into the waste-basket yourself? I am busy just at present."

Jack Overstroke (who is unwillingly giving Miss Olecrop a swimming lesson)—"Now don't be afraid Just trust yourself to me, and let me support you."

Miss Olecrop—"It's rather an unfair advantage to take in the water, but you may ask P-P-Papa."

Bertie—"Yes, dearest."

Mamma—"And you mustn't wipe your nose on your Fauntleroy sash or mamma will have to whip you."

Bertie—"No, dearest."

Mamma—"Above all things, remember under no circumstances take your hat off because your Fauntleroy curls are sewed in the brim

Bobby—"Ma, I've pretty near out-grown my slippers, haven't I?"

Mamma—"Yes, Bobby.

DOWN IN THE DELL.

"I will bring you a lovely cluster of wild roses, papa."

"Very well, Fannie; don't hurry back, for I think you linger too constantly beside my chair, and I want you to take a long ramble. I will read, dear."

And Andrew Mahr drew one of the papers that lay on a table near him on his knee, and unfolded it. Fannie bent and kissed his worn, tender face; and then, with the soft refrain of an old song on her lips, ran lightly down the path, and left him there in the shadow of the great tree before his door, with that ever-growing wistfulness in his eyes as they followed her, and that terrible, gnawing pain in his heart of which she was the centre.

"My only one—my one ewe lamb!" he murmured; "and have guided and guarded her for sixteen years, kept her life free of shadow or trial. And now—now when I know that my days are numbered, I can find in this whole wide world no single heart on which she can lean in that dreadful hour when she knows that I am no longer with her. If I might leave her wealth—gold will buy kindness; but she will be alone, poor, helpless—my tenderly cherished child!"

The cough that came so often and shook him so terribly stopped his murmured words, and when he drew down the handkerchief which he had lifted to his lips, it was stained with blood.

"My child!" he moaned—"my child! and she does not know my danger. How can I tell her?"

For she did not know that a shadow dark and dismal was upon him. He was weak; but that was all she knew. When the summer was over and autumn came, he had told her that he would be well and strong once more, and she believed him.

When two are all to all to each other, and there are none to whisper the warning, one of them never dreams of an hour when he or she will live in a world which shall know the other no more forever.

And so it was with the motherless girl who trilled her soft song as she went through the sunlight. She had but her father in all the vastness of the earth, and she did not dream that he was dying, as dies a tree, to the root of which some parasite has fastened itself to drain the stately life, unseen.

She went through the small garden of the Mahrs—for they were poor and their acres scanty—and out at a little gate and along the quiet country roadway. It was such a still, secluded spot to which Albert Mahr had taken his motherless child in that fierce tempest of grief which had swept over his soul as the clods fell on his dead wife's coffin.

There was no need for her to keep the broad hat over her sunny hair—no curious eyes would see—so she hung it on her arm and tripped lightly onward, stopping now and then to gather a wayside rose, as late, and fresh and sweet as any of the soft hued flowers that presently filled her hands.

She left the road at last and penetrated into a green dell beside it, where ferns grew thick and green.

"I will take some home," she said aloud, "papa will like them."

And she bent over some feathery friends, when a low moan made her start erect, pale and breathless.

"It sounded like a smothered cry of pain," she whispered. "What shall I do?"

But as the moan reached her again, this time sounding very clearly, the warm young heart in her bosom answered her question and sent her forward toward the sound.

Down in the deep, green heart of the dell she saw a man's form lying prostrate among a few loose stones and broken branches; and fearing nothing but loosing all her soft, sweet bloom in sudden pity, she hastened to the side of the fallen man.

"What is it?" she asked, falteringly. "You are in pain, are you not?"

But there was no answer; the moans had ceased. She bent lower, lower, then knelt and turned the face, until now hidden from her sight.

It was clear cut, handsome young—a face which she had seen many a time and oft flit by her simple home in the early morning or the twilight hours—the face of one who was looked up to for his wealth and position, his pride and his nobility. But as she looked on it now she saw only a blue line of pain about the well cut lips, and a white, senseless rigidity upon the whole handsome face.

"What shall I do!" she cried out, trembling so that the head slid from her hold and lay once more on the earth.

She looked about her. Yes, there was a small stream near. She ran to it, dipped in her handkerchief, and hastening back, bathed the white, set face.

Then a fear stole over her that he was dead—dead! and actual terror made her gray eyes fill with tears and sobs burst from her.

"Oh, please speak to me!" she cried imploringly—"try to speak! I am so—so frightened."

And suddenly the color rushed into the face below her, the lids flew up, and a pair of bonnie brown eyes met hers.

Would she ever forget the sense of relief, of joy, of gladness, that came as she knelt there and saw life flush back into Glynn Herno's face! Would he ever forget the strange sweetnes he found in those tearful, gray eyes, on those tremulous, red lips, in the soft, shy, troubled face that colored as he looked upon it!

"Have I alarmed you?" he asked, lifting himself on his elbow, as she drew away. "I had a fall here, and my ankle is sprained. That is all, I think, but the pain was terrible. I felt myself growing faint with it, and called."

"Yes," she said, trying to check her sobs; "I heard you, and when I reached here I thought you dead."

She shivered as she said the last word, and he smiled a little.

"Poor child! he said, gently; "you are terribly shaken, and I am so sorry to have been the cause of it. Now, what is to be done with me? I cannot walk, for it was the attempt to stand that gave me such agony."

He sat up, and made a wry face as he moved the injured foot.

He had removed the boot before Fannie's arrival, and she could see that the foot was swelling rapidly.

"If you would let me help you," she said, shyly "perhaps you could get to my home and papa would know what to do for you. It is not far—only beyond sight there."

"Perhaps," he said, dubiously, looking at the slight figure, with the ghost of a smile in his eyes. "I will try not to tax your strength too greatly; but if I might lean a little on your shoulder—my foot is perfectly useless, and the ankle burns like fire."

So, after a few moments of hesitation and many a keen pang to Glynn Herno, which he bore in silence, but with whitening lips, the two reached Fannie's home, and considerably startled Mr. Mahr, who saw them advance haltingly toward him.

In half an hour the young man—until then a stranger to them, but to be a stranger no more forever to Albert Mahr and his fair daughter—was lying comfortably on a sofa in the tiny parlor, his foot swathed in bandages, which Fannie kept moist and cool, awaiting the carriage which had been sent for but half wishing that he might remain where he was, ministered to by those small, white hands—looked on so sympathetically by those tender eyes—and spoken to so kindly by that gentle old man, whose face was so wan and shadowy in the fading day that it made his heart ache to look upon it.

Perhaps it was the shadow that touched her unconscious brow—the terrible pain and loss which he so clearly foresaw for her, and which he saw she neither dreamed of nor feared—that first awakened a tenderness for her in Glynn Herno's breast.

Be it as it may, when he was borne toward his home, the memory of a girl's sweet face went with him and made him half unconscious of his pain.

And during the week that followed, while he was unable to use his foot in any way, that sweet face seemed to hover near him always, and the longing to see it again grew with every passing hour.

When at last he could wear a slipper, he allowed his longing to send him to her pretty, simple home; and he found such a charm there that he went again and again day after day, even after his ankle had grown strong and well.

And Mr. Mahr, praying daily for a friend for his child in the time when she would so sorely need one, did not perceive the the fact that God, in sending Glynn Herno, had sent her all for which his tender lips supplicated, until the evening in the gloaming, when the two men sat alone in the little porlor, and Glynn told him of the love which had grown in his heart for Fannie and asked him for permission to woe her for his wife.

The old man bowed his white head, and a thanksgiving to heaven lay softly on his lips; then he put out his hand and clasped Glynn's weakly but warmly.

"Good bless you!" he said with a falter in his voice. "I am gooing from her, and it was so hard to leave her all alone! Now—now I shall not fear for her future, for you are all a man should be, and she cares for you, I know. Win her whole heart, make her love you as her mother loved me in my youth, and I shall close my eyes knowing that she will sorrow for me indeed, but be firmly sustained with her hand in yours, your love about her."

And so it was. She was a happy wife when the shaft of sorrow struck her, and Glynn's heart was her shield against it.

Jones—"I saw Blinkins yesterday. He is doing first rate and has a new watch and chain."

Brown—"He must have gotten down to steady work."

"Yes, he has. He's in the penitentiary."

His Life for His Brothers.

The following story is preserved in the Bodleion Library at Oxford:

The tower door of St. Leonard's Church, Bridgenorth, England, was left open, and two young boys wandering in, were tempted to mount up into the upper part and scramble from beam to beam.

All at once a joist gave way. The beam on which they were standing became displaced. The elder had just time to grasp it when falling, while the younger, slipping over his body, caught hold of his comrade's legs.

In this fearful position the poor lads hung, crying vainly for help for no one was near. At length the boy clinging to the beam became exhausted. He could no longer support the double weight. He called out to the lad below that they were both done for.

"Could you save yourself if I were to loose you?" replied the lit, tle lad.

"I think I could," returned the older.

"Then good-bye, and God bless you!" cried the little fellow, losing his hold.

Another second and he was dashed to pieces on the stone floor below, his companion clambering to a place of safety.

He Got a Loan.

The other evening a citizen who stood at the corner of Woodward and Jefferson avenues was asked by a stranger for a nickel to pay car fare up Michigan avenue.

"You look able to walk," was the reply.

"So I am; but I'm in a great hurry."

"It strikes me as pretty checky for a tramp to beg money to ride on when his legs are all right."

"My dear man this is an exceptional case. I was up that avenue to day and met a citizen who pitied my forlorn condition. He didn't have any boodle with him just then but promised to give me fifty cents if I would meet him at the corner of Fifteenth street at 9 o'clock.

It is now 8:30. I can't make it on foot. If I don't get a nickle I am gone up for that half. Please look at the case with a business eye and favor me with the loan."

He was favored and he got on the front end of the car, so as to get there seventeen feet ahead of the rear platform.

Mrs. Chitchat (caller)—"Why, my dear Mrs. Starvem what is the matter? You look distressed."

Mrs. Starvem (boarding house landlady)—"Oh, the awfulest thing has happened! You remember Mr. Griggs, who used to board here at $9 a week, and was such a comfort to me?"

Mrs. C.—"Yes. You said he had scarcely any teeth left, and could barely eat a thing. Didn't cost any more to keep than a kitten."

Mrs. S.—"That's the one. Oh, he's a villian! He came back yesterday, and I let him have board at only $8 a week, and now I find he's got a new set of false teeth, and eats like a [illegible]."

Superintendent of an Electric Railway, to applicant for a position.—"What is your name?"

Applicant—"Wood, sir."

"You want to be appointed conductor?"

"Yes, sir."

"Can't take you, sir."

"Why not?"

"Electric experts say that Wood is a poor conductor."

The court sentenced him to ninety-nine years' imprisonment.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Oct 11.—President Harrison has not passed a pleasant week, politically speaking. First Assistant Postmaster General Clarkson, returned from a pilgrimage he made to Mahone's home, at President Harrisons suggestion, and brought back bad news. That was a terrible disappointment as Mahone had made the President believe that he was certain to carry Virginia. Then came the news that Indianapolis his old home, had gone democratic, and to add to the discomfort caused by this news, several private telegrams gave the information that the Ex Union soldiers were responsible for it, and that they intended it as a rebuke for the removal of Tanner. The same news has created a stampede among the Ohio republicans here. They recognize the fact that if anything like the same rate dissatisfaction is shown in the soldier vote in that state as was exhibited at Indianapolis their chances of carrying the state are gone glimmering into the limbo of might have beens.

The only member of the administration that is not disappointed at Mahones waning prospects in Virginia is Mr. Blaine. He has never liked Mahone, and has never taken any trouble to conceal his dislike.

Much excitement was created among democrats here early in the week by the publication of a telegram stating that Hon. Samuel J. Randall would never again be able to occupy his seat in the House. Later news allayed it. A telegram direct from Mr. Randall stated that his health was much better than for several years, and that he would be in Washington in the course of a few weeks prepared to take an active part in the proceedings of the House. Samuel Randalls valuable services will be constantly needed by the minority this winter.

Some amusement has been created here by the fact that ex Senator Kellog went all the way to Chicago to fire a broadside into Harrisons manner of distributing the offices in the South, through the medium of a newspaper interview. Kellog got very badly left, and the grapes are consequently very, very sour.

The Knights Templar and their friends in attendance upon the twenty fourth triennial conclave of the order here had entire possession of Washington this week. They have paraded 25,000 strong have been reviewed and received at a special reception by the President; have been wined, dined and feted by hospitable Washingtonians; have made pilgrimages to and held special services at the grave of their deceased brother, G. Washington Esq., and have to a man eye, and to a woman too, expressed themselves in favor of Washington as the place for holding the Worlds Exposition in 1892.

S. G. Brock, of Missouri, who was defeated in the first Congressional district of that state at the last election by Representative Hatch, has been appointed chief of the bureau of statistics of the Treasury department.

The silver senate jubilant over the appointment of Edward O. Leech, of the District of Columbia, to be Director of the Mint. They expect that the new official will so construe the law as to compell the Government to purchase and coin the full amount of silver bullion authorized by law—$4,000,000 per month. A curious thing about his indorsers, which were principally from the Pacific coast, was that both New York Senators were among them. He has been connected with the mint bureau since its organization in 1873.

Secretary Noble is not popular with his colleagues in the Cabinet, and if the republicans lose Ohio, as now seems extremely probable, they will doubtless make things too unpleasant for him to stay. They blame him for not smoothing up the Tanner business and saving the administration from its present embarrassing position with the soldier vote. He takes things very easily and says he has nothing to regret, and further that he intends to see to it that no subordinate official shall usurp any of prerogatives belonging properly to the Secretary of the Interior.

The navy department has decided to accept the gun boat "Petrel," and the contractors have been notified to deliver her at the Norfolk navy yard.

Considerable surprise has been created here by the announcement that ex Representative Glover, of Missouri had entered the Senatorial contest in that State in opposition to Senator Vest.

The government of Switzerland has voluntarily apologized for the imprisonment of an American citizen travelling in that country.

Examination.

I will hold my last examination at Green Bank, on Saturday Octb 26, beginning at eight o'clock, A M.

M. G. MATHEWS,

An Editor's Adventure.

From the New York Star.

"I once had another experience," the old editor continued, "not far from the same locality, between 2 and 3 o'clock of the morning, after I had got out from my night's work at the editorial desk. In a solitary and dimly lighted part of Frankfort street, through which I was trudging. I became aware, unexpectedly, that some one stood in the shadow of an old building. I was suddenly confronted by three rough looking characters, one of whom brought his face close up to mine, and said in a low voice: 'Got any money, mister?' 'Money?' I replied, while standing as cool as a cucumber, 'Money! Yes, I've got a pocketful;' and I jingled some silver in the pocket of my trousers. 'How much do you want?' I asked. 'Got a quarter about yer?' he gruffly said, as he stood beside his two pals. 'A quarter, you fool?' I replied, 'a quarter! take a half dollar, and go away from me.' 'And you,' I said to each of the two others 'here is a half for you and go away from me!' The men were astounded, took the money, cried, 'Hurrah for you!' 'Thank you,' and decamped along a side street. I suppose that, if I had not done as I did, I would have been knocked down and robbed, but, as it happened, I saved myself from that fate, and am waiting for other adventures after midnight."

The Problem of Education.

Mr. W. H. H. Murray, of Boston, once a preacher, and now a Bohemian, has been called many rough names, but nobody has ever called him a fool.

The other day Mr. Murray lectured in Boston on "The Problem of Education," and some of his views deserve to be considered by every thoughtful citizen.

Our present system of education, the lecturer thinks, falls short of what it should be. It is a great mistake to suppose that wisdom is to be found between the covers of a book and absorbed by the reader. It is not true education to stuff a child's mind with the contents of text books. Too much of what is taught in our schools educates the pupil away from a useful life. The child is led to believe that useful lines of employment are beneath him, and that it is more genteel to be idle than to be a toiler. Such a system of education is a mistaken system. It is not peculiar to the public schools alone; it runs through our entire educational system. What is needed is an education that will send every pupil into the world prepared and determined to do something useful.

Undoubtedly Mr. Murray is on the right line, and the popularity of our industrial schools shows that the people are with him. In this practical age education is judged by its results. The system yielding a product of well equipped, industrious and successful men is the best.

What makes success? The Scientific American answers this question. It says: "Ninety-nine per cent of ambition to try, and one per cent of talent, will insure success in whatever we undertake."

Nurse (to fashionable mother): "The baby is very restless, ma'am. I can't do anything with her."

Fashionable Mother: "She's teething, I suppose?"

Nurse—Yes'm. I think if you was to take her in your arms a little while, it might soothe her."

Fashionable Mother—"I? Impossible. I haven't the time to spare. I am just making ready to attend a meeting of the society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Give baby some paregoric."

Yellowly—"Why, Brownly, how bad you look this morning. Did you sleep any last night?"

Brownly—"Not a wink."

Y.—"Anybody sick?"

B.—"I am."

Y.—"What's the matter?"

B.—"Well, you see, my wife has been in the habit of going through my pockets at night, and I thought what was good for the gander was good for the goose, so after she fell asleep last night I arose and set out to go through her pocket."

Y.—"Get anything?"

B.—"No. Searched the dress over and over, spent the whole night at it, but couldn't find the pocket."

Sharp Parent (at head of stairs)—"Clara! It's time for you to go to bed."

Clara (in the parlor)—"Why, pa, Mr. Greene is here!"

"Oh! I beg pardon. I thought it was Mr. Brown, and I haven't any patience with Mr. Brown. He always kisses you with such loud smacks that it wakes me up. Stay as long as you please, Mr. Greene. You are always welcome."

Mr. Greene—"I'm!—thank you, but I was just getting ready to go, and I—I promised my chum I'd be back early. Good night!"

Editor' fiercely, to office boy—"See here, boy! If you let another poet in here this week, I'll break every bone in your body and hang you up for a towel. Mind you, now. No long haired person comes into this office hereafter."

Office boy, meekly—"Yes, sir."

Editor, three hours later—"Who was that beautiful young lady who turned in from the street and then went away again?"

Office boy—"That was the new bankers, daughter Miss Lovelydot, and she wanted to subscribe. But I had to follow your orders, sir."

I have just perfected a machine— His Wife: Yes that's it. Why don't you invent a machine to help me with my work instead of inventing something to do the work for the men so that they can loaf about and drink beer! Inventor: Thats just what I have done. I've invented a contrivance that will save two-thirds of your time. Wife: is that so? You are a dear darling of a husband after all! What is it you have invented for me? Inventor: A talking machine.

Mrs. Norash—I don't see why you can't be more careful. You might save a good deal out of your income if you'd try.

Mr. Norash—Huh! Look at Lighthead. He saveh up $2,000 and went to a horse race yesterday, bet on the wrong horse, and lost every cent of it. Now he's dead—killed himself. I was there with him and lost all I had, too, but it wasn't enough to bother about.

Wife—"The 29th of February we shall celebrate our silver wedding. Don't you think we ought to kill the fat pig and have a feast?"
Husband—"Kill the fat pig! I don't see how the unfortunate animal is to blame for what happened twenty five years ago."

"Young man," said the long haired passenger to the occupant of the seat ahead," do you know that I have never spent a dollar for liquor in my whole life?" Really,"responded the young man, turning half way round with a look of great interest in his face. How do you work it?"

Scrupulous post office clerk—"No, sir, I can't cash your money order unless you can prove your identity."

Stranger, after searching his pockets in vain for letters' etc.—"Oh, here is my photograph, won't that convince you?"

Clerk' examining it closely—"Well, yes' there seems to be no doubt about that. How much is your order for, sir?"

Brown—"It is a very strange thing about that suicide last night No apparent motive can be found."

Mrs. Brown—"Was the poor man married?"

"Didn't I just tell you there was no apparent motive?"

American editor, in a town which has just been swept by fire and flood—"Was anything saved from the wreck?"

Foreman—"I have dug out a few handfuls of type some boot blacking and a bundle of wrapping paper."

"Good! Tell the newsboys we will have an extra out in half an hour."

Mrs. Sevenup—"Yes I like this flat very much but, fortunately, we have only taken it by the month because we will have to move out."
Caller—"Why, what is the matter?"
"Some very dear friends of ours have taken a flat in this same building, and you know it's perfectly horrid to have friends so close."

Little boy—"Our cook has gone away and I'm awful glad. Now mamma will have to make the cake and mamma's cake is always heavy."

Guest—"Well, I declare! Do you prefer heavy cake?"

"Yes'm. You get more chewin' in one piece."

"Hello, Lamb, are you still striking it rich in Wall street?"

"No; in fact, I lost all that I had there!"

"I'm sorry for that. What are you doing now?"

"Just now I'm writing 'Tips for Speculators, for the daily press."

MARCHHARE'S WILL.

If there hadn't been a touch of—well, to put it mildly—a touch of eccentricity about old John Marchhare, he would have hardly made such a will.

Several years before the vessel in which he was returning from the West Indies went down at sea with near all on board John Marchhare was picked up by one of the boats, clinging to a little girl—a mere child—whose life he had saved, while her relatives and all who knew her were among the lost.

From the little stranger thus thrown upon his care he did not turn away. She was too young to give any account of her parents or family; and all subsequent efforts to discover her kindred or whence she came proved fruitless. John Marchhare adopted her and took her to his home and heart.

Having neither wife nor child, he felt free to do as he would with his handsome fortune; and it pleased him that it should go to his adopted daughter—"provided," so ran his will "that if my said adopted daughter should marry during the lifetime of brother, Edward Marchhare, whom I hereby constitute her guardian, without the approval of my said brother, then the foregoing bequests and devises shall become void, and my whole estate shall go to my said brother."

This was an eccentric will; but, we have already said John Marchhare was an eccentric man. It is easy to see that it was left to Alice Marchhare, as she was called, the threefold choice of accepting a husband of her guardian's selection, of remaining single during his lifetime, or of forfeiting her fortune. That it was thus made the interest of Edward Marchhare to oppose any match that might be offered to Alice was a point that probably did not occur to the testator, or, more likely still, he knew his brother better than to suspect that sordid motives would ever sway him in fulfilling a trust committed to his conscience.

Alice had barely reached womanhood when her benefactor died; but when it was known how John Marchhare's will read and the power it gave his brother, suitors swarmed around about the young lady and her guardian, and it is hardly told to which they were the most obsequious.

George Preston had not waited for the publication of John Marchhare's will as the signal for falling in love with Alice, as several others had done, in spite of her beauty. The truth is, he had been in that state as far back as he could remember. And Alice, we may as well let the reader know, had always liked George.

But when George Preston asked Mr. Edward Marchhare's permission to tender his hand to Alice, the old gentleman shook his head.

"Have you a home to offer her?" he asked, "or means to support her?" he added, before George, in his confusion, could find an answer.

"Perhaps," he continued, giving the young man no time to recover himself—"perhaps you think Alice's fortune sufficient for both. Now, whether she shall have one or not"——

"Is a question I have never stopped to ask," broke in George, indignantly.

"Whether she shall have a fortune or not," said Mr. Marchhare, disregarding the interruption, "depends on her not marrying in opposition to my wishes; and I shall certainly never wish to see her wedded to a man willing to be dependent for a living on the bounty of his wife."

"You much mistake me," cried George, with flushed face, "if you rank me in that class. I have strength and energy"——

"But as yet they are untried," said Alice's guardian, without waiting for him to finish. "I am willing to put you to the test, however. Return in three years the possessor of $5,000 saved from your own earnings, and if Alice then consents to hear your offer I shall not oppose it."

George's face brightened. A much severer ordeal would not have daunted him. And when he took leave of Alice though there was no formal plighting of troth between them, he had no misgiving lest the end of three years should not find her faithfully waiting his return.

* * * * * *

The allotted time had nearly gone by before George, after many struggles and hardships, had succeeded in laying up the sum which entitled him to appear and claim of Marchhare the fulfillment of his promise.

At a railway station, the last stopping place on his journey home he went into the refreshment room for supper. He had not half finished the scanty repast when the bell, and the summons of the porters, caused a general commotion and rush for the train. George caught up his overcoat, and followed the rest.

On reaching his destination he was about to draw on his overcoat preparatory to leaving the carriage, when for the first time he discovered that the garment he had brought from the supper-room was not his own. It was similar in color and material, but the attempt to put it on at once revealed the difference. He was thunderstruck at the discovery. In a secret pocket of his own coat was the banknotes which had cost him three years of anxious toil, and which represented so many precious hopes.

He wildly ran among the dispersing passengers, looking sharply at every man he met, as though expecting to find upon him the object of his search. But all in vain; it was nowhere to be seen.

With a vague purpose of advertising everywhere, and telegraphing in all directions, he was hurrying rapidly along, when whom should he meet but Mr. Marchhare?

George's first greeting was to blurt out his loss.

"I am very sorry," said the old gentleman, gravely; "but you know my conditions; and with respect to their fulfillment, it seems you are just where you started."

"Give me but another chance," cried George. "I can earn double as much in the same time. I will work night and day to do it!"

"Your time is up to-day," said Mr. Marchhare, "and I have promised my old friend, Wells, in the event of your failure, that his son Lawrence may pay his addresses to Alice to-morrow. The young man, though well enough in something of a fop, and I doubt if Alice will listen to his suit. Ah, here he comes! Shall I introduce you?"

"Stewp thief! stewp thief!" shouted a foppish look youth, rushing forward and seizing George by the collar.

"What do you mean?" exclaimed George, flushing under the hand so rudely laid upon him.

"What's the matter, Lawrence?" asked Mr. Marchhare, astonished at the proceeding.

"Mattah! mattah enough, I should say! Why, that the fellah stawle my cwoat! There it is now on his arm."

"Come, come!" interpose Mr. Marchhare; "mistakes will happen sometimes."

"Mistwake!" sneered Lawrence Wells. "A vewy likely mistwake, seeing mine's twice the best cwoat, and his is more than a yeah behind fwashion. I'm almost ashwamed to be sween in it; I am, upon my swoul. But I'll have satisfaction. I'll cawll the police!

After a quick glance at the young man's apparel, George flung aside the coat on his arm, and, placing a hand on each of the dandy's shoulders, got him out of the one he had on, in a manner more expeditious than gentle. Hastily examining the secret pocket, George found his money safe; and Lawrence Wells was convinced, under all the circumstances, that there had, indeed, been a mistake. Mr. Marchhare took him aside, and explained that his call on Alice must be postponed for the present. We need scarcely add that it never took place.

CANDIDATE BOWSER.

"Well what do you think?" queried Mr. Bowser, as he looked up at me across the supper table one evening.

"You—you haven't been and bought another horse, Mr. Bowser?"

Horse! Can't you think of anything but horse? I suppose you'll throw that horse up to me to your dying day?"

"I'm so glad you have decided not to buy another! Is it some more chickens, or a new fire-escape, or another dog to eat us up?"

He turned pale and refused to say another word for two hours. Then he could hold himself no longer, and he [illegible] observed:

"I suppose you will feel proud of the title Mrs. Ald. Bowser."

"What do you mean?"

"Just what I say. You are soon to be known as Mrs. Ald. Bowser."

"Are you going to run for office?"

"I am. It was all settled this afternoon. I am going to be nominated for alderman of this ward."

"Mr. Bowser, is it possible that you are going to let them lead you into any such foolishness? I thought you had a more level head than that, in spite of your mistakes."

"My mistakes!" he shouted. "I never made one in my life, except when I married you! Level head! I'd like to see someone who carries a more level head than I do!"

"And so you are going to be alderman?"

"If I live."

"But what for?"

"Because it is the wish of the people. My country calls. The committee have canvassed the ward and concluded that I was not only the best man for the office, but the only one who stood any show against the vicious opposition. It is a sacrifice on my part, but the true patriot must sacrifice."

"I'm so sorry!"

"So sorry! For what? Because I have been selected above all others! Because honors have been thrust upon me! Mrs. Bowser, you have never appreciated the man you married, and you probably never will."

"Well, I shan't say any more. I think it is a put-up job to get money out of you, and I know what a gang will be running here after you. It's your own affair, however. Don't blame me if you get left."

"There you go! Always opposed to me! I can plainly see why some men never get along. If I had a wife like some I know of I'd have been Governor of the State long ago. I'm going to run, however, and after I'm elected you'll probably be just mean enough to say you brought it about."

I didn't say any more. As soon as he left the house next morning I prepared for visitors, and I wasn't disappointed. He was hardly out of sight before the bell rang, and I opened the door to find a dirty-looking fellow with his hat on his ear who asked:

"Is Bowser at home?"

"No, sir."

"Gone out pretty early, doesn't he? Leave any money for me?"

"No, sir."

"He didn't, eh? Purty specimen of a candidate he is! Expects us to do all the figgerin' for nothin, does he?"

"Who are you, sir?"

"Who am I?" he repeated as he cocked his hat a little more and spit over his shoulder. "I'm the [illegible]

DEMOCRATIC VICTORY

EVERYTHING DEMOCRATIC.

A GRAND WALKOVER FOR THE DEMOCRATS.

The South is Faithful to the Democracy of Jefferson and Jackson.

VIRGINIA.

Virginia gives McKinney a majority of over 42,000. The House stands 19 Democrats, 14 Republicans; doubtful, one. The Senate stands: Democrats, 29; Republicans 9, and one doubtful. This is the smallest representation the Republicans have had in the Legislature in the history of the State.

OHIO.

Campbell's plurality in Ohio is over 10,000 and the Legislature will be Democratic by nine on joint ballot.

IOWA.

Boies, Democrat, elected Governor of Iowa by 7,000 votes. The legislature has eight Republican majority.

NEW YORK.

New York is Democratic by over 20,000.

NEW JERSEY

New Jersey elected her Democratic Governor by over 10,000.

The Democrats make large gains all over the country.

Thanksgiving Proclamation.

The President has issued a proclamation appointing Thursday, November 28th, as a day of national thanksgiving. He says: "A highly favored people, mindful of their dependence on the bounty of Divine Providence, should seek fitting occasion to testify gratitude and ascribe praise to Him who is author of their many blessings. It behooves us, then, to look back with thankful hearts over the past year, and bless God for His infinite mercy in vouchsafing to our land enduring peace, to our people freedom from pestilence and famine, to our husbandmen abundant harvests and to them that labor a recompense of their toil."

He recommends that the day "be set apart as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, and that the people of our country, ceasing from the cares and labors of their working day, shall assemble in their respective places of worship and give thanks to God, who has prospered us on our way and made our paths the paths of peace; beseeching Him to bless the day to our present and future good making it truly one of thanksgiving for each re-united home as for the nation at large."

SALE OF REAL ESTATE FOR TAXES.

HOME NEWS.

—M. G. Mathews, Co., Supt., was in to see us last Friday.

—Rice Moore, Esq., of Dunmore is in town.

—Dr. M. Wallace, of Mill Point, was in our burg Tuesday.

—The roads are in a very bad condition.

—It rains promptly every other day, and very frequently between times.

—I. B. Moore, Esq., passed through our city Tuesday, with some nice cattle.

—Lemuel J. Pyles, we understand started Tuesday to Dakota for his wife and child.

—Mr. Geo. W. Beverage, of Traveler's Repose was in to see us last Friday.

—Knapp's creek got high, and the mails failed to get in Saturday night.

—Mr. Hugh Adams, of Rockbridge Baths, Va., passed through town Tuesday with a drove of fine cattle.

—Dr. McClintic and wife, of Edray, passed through town Tuesday, on their way home from their bridal tour.

—Our Republican friends are a little down in the mouth over the results of last Tuesday's elections. We know how you feel, we've been there.

—For restoring the color, thickening the growth, and beautifying the hair, and for preventing baldness, Hall's Hair Renewer is unsurpassed.

—H. P. McGlaughlin, Esq., was at Elkins, Randolph Co., last week and reports that Elkins is now quite a town, and growing rapidly.

—Here's to Grover Cleveland next President of the United States, and Jas. E. Campbell, of O. Vice-President.

—We have enough of wood to do us until Xmas and smoking tobacco to do us nearly that long and a subscriber that promised to pay his subscription in buckwheat, so we can feel pretty sassy for awhile.

—The republicans say this is an "off year." They are mistaken it is a year of Harrison's administration, and if it keeps on at the same rate, for the next three years, '92 will be a year of wiping the republicans "off" the face of the earth.

—The combination of ingredients found in Ayer's Pills renders them tonic and curative as well as cathartic. For this reason they are the best medicine for people of costive habit, as they restore the natural action of the bowels, without debiliating.

—There is no more fruitful source of disease than vitiated blood. It involves every organ and function of the body, and if not immediately corrected by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, sooner or later leads to fatal results. Be warned in time.

NOTICE TO OUR PATRONS.—With this issue of THE TIMES the year expires, with the majority of our subscribers, and those who receive a statement of their account by letter, are expected to respond promptly, and our large, mailing lists such as, Academy, Mill Point, Edray, Dunmore, and Green Bank, you will find a statement with the Post Master to whom you are expected to pay promptly, and our subscribers at this place who are in arrears will call at our office and settle.

This is the first time for a year that we have asked you for money, [illegible] year will be all that is necessary, as we very much dislike to see the columns of a newspaper filled with duns, instead of something more wholesome to read.

—Harry W. Campbell, who has been at Academy for two or three years past, has gone to Elkins, Randolph Co., to work at the carpenter trade.

—Messrs. Wm. T. Perry and family and W. P. Shiplett, and family who sold their farm on Beaver Creek sometime ago to Mr. D. O'Connell, started Tuesday for Texas, where they will make their future home. These excellent people will be greatly missed by our entire community, and we sincerely wish them health and prosperity in their new homes.

Green Bank Items.

On last Saturday morning, Mess. W. E. Grogg and Jno. F. Wooddell met a heavy loss, and came very near losing their lives. They had come over from the west side of Greenbrier river, on the day before to Hevener's mill, with a wagon and three horse team, loaded with grain. On their return in attempting to cross Deer creek, which had been very much swollen by the heavy rain the night before, they had their wagon and team carried down the stream, and only saved their lives by clinging to to foot bridge below the ford as they passed under. The lead horse was rescued and the other two were drownd, and their grain, besides a quantity of goods they had purchased at the stores, were almost a total loss.

Mrs. Dan Ralston and children, Mr. Hook and Miss Lizzie Cook, all of Highland, are visiting Mr. J. H. Ralston of this place.

Mr. Jas. H. Curry, Sr., who has been suffering very much from an attack of erysipelas for the past week, is somewhat improved at this writing.

Miss Gracie Hull, has been quite ill with diphtheria for several days, and is not much improved.

Rev. W. H. Balleugee, will go to Sunset this week to hold a protracted meeting.

Died, Nov. 2nd, near Green Bank, Adam Richard, son of Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Arbogast, aged about three years. The bereaved parents have our sympathies in this sad dispensation.

PAULINA.

Traveler's Repose Locals.

Miss Monte Arbogast, who has been visiting relatives and friends at this place for several months left for her home in Texas last week.

Mr. Mack Yeager, is off to Cheat Bridge, on a hunting expedition.

Mrs. Chas. Pritchard, and son of Red Creek, Tucker Co., are now at her father's M. P. Yeager, of this place.

Mr. C. M. Kellar, while hunting Tuesday succeeded in killing a bear and a fawn.

Mr. Brown Yeager is off on a business trip to Cheat Bridge.

The cook at the lumber camp has left and his place will be filled by George D. Houchen and wife and J. D. Wilmoth and wife, the coming winter.

Will Arbogast and wife of Green Bank are visiting at C. M. Keller's.

Mrs. Sarah Arbogast, is visiting her daughter Mrs. Chris Arbogast, of Green Bank.

Last Sunday night while Rev. Geo. Hannah and P. D. Arbogast were holding a meeting at Pine Grove school house, the floor which was densely packed with people suddenly gave way, some fainted, and Mr. A. losing his presence of mind proceeded forthwith to demolish a window. No one was injured and quiet was soon restored. The last that was seen of Mr. A., he was wandering around the school house wondering what he would do.

The Savannah News tells of a woman in Wadely, Ga., who has become a grand-mother at the age of 30. She married when only 14, and her daughter did likewise.

WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8.—President Harison introduced an innovation in White House customs this week that is deeply regretted by conservative people, who believe that the dignity of the Presidential office should be increased instead of lessened. To such people it was a positive shock to find that the President had had himself interviewed by a newspaper, on the election returns, in order to try and counteract the dampening effect they had upon his party associates, and also to furnish them with a cue to explain the crushing defeat away. If President Harrison really believes as he says he does, that the result of the elections held last Tuesday was not intended as a verdict upon his administration, then he has not the sense that he has generally been credited with by even his opponents. A curious coincidence in the same paper is an interview with Mr. Halford, the President's private Secretary, which in sentiment is precisely the same as that with President Harrison. These interviews are regarded here, even by republicans, as a very weak and undignified attempt to fool the country. Republicans of prominence openly admit that the result of the election is a stinging rebuke to the administration and its methods. Old soldiers quietly chuckle and whisper "I told you so" to one another.

Battle in Court.

Lexington Va., November 8.—At Brownsburg, Rockbridge county, Virginia, to-day, Dr. P. J. Walker, a prominent physician, was arrested on complaint of Henry Miller, a wealthy citizen, whom Walker had threatened for insulting his wife. In court both men drew their revolvers and a battle ensued. Miller was killed. Walker was fatally wounded, and Mrs. Walker, who was in court as a witness was killed. Dan and Wm. Miller, sons of the accused, were shot and seriously wounded. Others, whose names were not learned, were hurt. A sheriff and posse have gone to the scene.

Petersburg, Va., had a $50,000 fire last week, in which a policeman was killed by a falling wall.

D. Williamson, of Indianapolis, purchased a curly walnut log from a Logan county, W. Va., man for $3,000.

A desperate fight occurred with pistol and knife between two prominent men, of Key, in the Louisville postoffice in which one was killed and the other dangerously wounded. Col. Wm. Cassins was the slayer and Col. A. M. Swope his victim.

NOTICE.—The District Division Sons of Temperance will meet at Hillsboro, Saturday, Nov. 19, 1889, at 11 o'clock, A. M. All members of the Order, in good standing cordially invited to attend. Delegates are especially enjoined to be on hand.

Night Session at 7 o'clock to which the Public are invited.

IT IS A CRUEL DEATH

A Dakota Sheriff Tells How It Feels to Be Hanged.

From the New York Star.

James E. Morgan, sheriff of Sherman county, S. Dak., is a native of this city, but has been in the west over thirty years. He is here on a visit, on Staten island, and he finds New York has undergone a mighty change since he left it in 1861 to go to the front.

"I find," said the sheriff to me the other night, "that the question whether a man should be hanged or executed electrically has been settled. I am glad to find that electricity has carried the day, for I assure you that death by hanging is intensely painful."

"Why, sheriff," I said, "is it possible that you were hanged?"

"Quite so, and it was no joke. When the war closed I went west to seek my fortune, and had a pretty hard time before I found anything even resembling it.

"One hard winter two others and myself went into Wyoming on a prospecting expedition, and had to maintain ourselves chiefly by hunting. Antelope was very scarce just then, and we suffered considerably by hunger.

"One morning we separated, the better to scour the country, agreeing to meet on a distant hill at noon My companions were hardly out of sight when I shot a steer, and was in the act of cutting it up when three fierce looking cowboys swooped down upon me.

"I am, as you see, swarthy, and they took me for a Mexican. As they also, were dirty looking, I made the same mistake, and saluted them in the little Spanish I had picked up.

"I happened that a tall cotton tree was conveniently close, and, without saying a word, one of them threw his lariat around my neck tossed the other end of the rope over a stout limb; his two companions pulled upon it, and I was in the twinkle of an eye going through all the agonies of hanging. The pain was frightful. There was a tremendous rushing through my ears, the sky and everything else turned blood red, pins and needles seemed to be sticking in every part of my body, and at the same time the back of my head felt as if it were being sandbagged at the rate of forty strokes a second. How long it lasted I couldn't tell. To me it seemed hours.

"When I regained consciousness, one of my friends was paring whisky down my throat and the other was rubbing my chest with the same liquid.

"It appears that my comrades had returned in time to cut me down before life had fled, but just then I wished they had let me be. The process of resuscitation was, if possible, still more agonizing than the hanging; but as the man condemned by law does not suffer in that regard, there is no use in dwelling upon it."

"But why did they hang you?"

"They were driving a herd of cattle to Idaho, and it was one of their steers I had shot. When my friends arrived and explained, the cowboys cut me down, and when I was ready to receive them they were profuse in their apologies.

"That is how I know that hanging is one of the most cruel deaths to which you can put a man."

party as carries this ward in his vest pocket, I am, and if old Bowser don't cum down liberally he gets left. Tell him to come and see me."

Nine times that forenoon I answered the bell to find a ward heeler or some other sort of political parasite on the door-step. One of them even went as far as to ask me to pledge Mr. Bowser to vote for him to run one of the City Hall elevators. There were three others waiting for him when he got home to dinner, and I saw him give them money, He came in excited a d jubilant, and when I told him what had occurred he replied:

"Let the dear people come! They know that I am the man to do all I can for them if I am elected, and elected I shall be as sure as the sun rises on that day. What do you think? I was talking with a prominent man belonging to the opposition and he said it would be no use for his party to put up a man against me. Bowser stock is way up, hey?"

For a week I lived in a state of miserable agitation. Every hour in the day a ward-heeler rang the bell, and when he wasn't ringing, it was some man who wanted a sewer or other contract. Every evening the house was full of politicians laying plans and guzzling down my currant wine, and on three nights Mr. Bowser had to "go the rounds" of the ward and "see the boys." On the last night I had to help him up stairs, and the tears rolled down his cheeks as he whimpered:

"Shap, Mrs. Bowser, it just breaks my heart to shee how e'r people love me. They cry f'r me, and—I cry f'r them'l."

This went on for a week, and then the caucus was held to nominate. Mr. Bowser said he would go through by acclamation, but as the boys would expect some sort of speech, not to say a keg of beer, afterwards, he would have to be on hand. As soon as nominated there would be on more heelers running after him, and a nomination meant election by a large majority. I didn't say much, but I felt pretty sure how it would come out.

"Along about 9 o'clock he came home. He was running. He also breathed hard and looked white.

"What on earth is the matter now?" I asked as he banged into the hall.

"G—gone!" he gasped

"How gone?"

"Gone up."

"Mr. Bowser tell me what has happened. You act as if you had met a ghost and lost your senses.

"I—I didn't get the nom—nomination!" he whispered, his knees quaking so that he had to sit down on a chair.

"Why didn't you?"

"Because they concluded that Sir Scott was the more popular and the stronger man."

"What! That cross-eyed loafer who was arrested one day last week for whipping his wife?"

"Y—yes."

We looked at each other for a long time without speaking. Then I said:

"I thought the dear people loved you, Mr. Bowser.

"Yes."

"You were to be selected above all others and honors were thrust upon you."

"Yes."

"Your country called upon you to down the vicious opposition. You were the patriot who was reedy to sacrifice himself."

"Yes."

"How much has this experience cost you?"

"Four hundred"

"Well, you have made a fool of yourself, and I hope it will be a lesson to you. You'd better go to bed."

"I—I guess I will."

At midnight he woke up, sat up in bed, and exclaimed:

"Look here, old lady, I hope you feel better, having accomplished your villianous object?"

"What do you mean?"

I mean that you defeated me in the caucus! Everybody knows you, and this opportunity for revenge could not be passover. Mrs. Bowser, you have gone a step too far! To-morrow I shall consult a lawyer about divorce proceedings."

"Go to sleep."

"Yes, I'll go to sleep, but don't imagine I shall forget or overlook your base, duplicity. I have borne and borne, but this is the end!

Next morning, however, he made no reference to the matter, and as some of his party made him believe that he had been withdrawn in the interests of harmony, he came home one day to observe:

"I hear that my name is being mentioned for Mayor, but I shan't take the nomination. I prefer to be a plain, humble citizen."

MISSION DOLORES.—"What is your mission here, sir?" asked the old man, with a frown.

"I am on three missions, sir," replied the poor young man, who was also a humorist.

"Well, what are they?" inquired the old man impatiently.

"Per mission to marry your daughter, ad-mission to your family circle, and sub mission to the regulations to your household."

"Ugh!" grunted the old man, who was something of a joker himself. "I have one little mission to offer before I conclude any arrangements with you."

"Name it," cried the poor young man eagerly. "I will only be too glad to perform it."

"Dis mission!" shrieked the old man with a loud, discordant laugh, and the poor young man fell dead at his feet.

"There's Blank over there—let's go and speak to him," he said to his friend as they were waiting at the Third street depot for a train.

"I'd rather not."

"Anything between you?"

"Well, yes. In fact, we have been rather cold for the last six months."

"Indeed! But I didn't know that. Some business transactions, I suppose?"

"Partly. I got the start of him in buying some property at a bargain, and to spite me he went out to Denver, hunted up my divorced wife and married her and brought her back here."

"Is it possible!"

"And he even rented the house next door to me, and she walks past forty times a day with her pug dog. Blank is a pretty good fellow, but he doesn't know when to stop. He ought to have stopped out west after marrying her."

Guard—Now, miss, jump in, please; train going on.

Child—But I can't go before I have kissed mamma.

"Jump in, miss. I'll see to that."

"What induced a married woman of your standing," said the newspaper man, "to leave such a charming family and elope?"

"Because," sobbed the wretched creature, "I had never had a compliment in my life, and I knew if I did something atrocious all the papers would say that I was handsome and attractive."

OUR LOVE STORY.

"We had been so happy!" I kept saying to myself—"We had been so happy!" And now it was all over—everything was over for me. He would take what he had chosen instead; but I—

I burst into tears as I sat on the rock by the spring where we had met so often—where I was waiting for him now—but I never faltered in saying to myself: "We must part. He is neither true to me nor to heaven—we must part."

And what was he? Only the village doctor—Benjamin Rue. And what was I? Only a little school teacher. Our united incomes were far less than anything that the wise-acres of society papers declare it "possible to marry on." but we had no fear. He was winning his way, and we loved each other; and, as I began by saying, we had been very happy.

But there had come to Johnstown where we lived, a lady of wealth, who gathered about her a certain little clique of scornful stylish people. They were openly infidel in opinion; all that I had been brought up to believe right and good they mocked at. All this would have been nothing to me in my school-house or in my own little room. I might never had done more than notice the handsome dresses of the ladies when they walked out or rode with their attendant cavaliers, and never have asked what their opinions were, but that soon after their arrival Mrs. Norland was take ill and sent for Dr. Rue. Ben was handsome, well read, full of bright fancies, and ready to enjoy himself at any time.

He relieved the lady of the pain she suffered, and became the family doctor at once. It was a step toward success. Naturally, he did not turn a cold shoulder to his patrons when they offered him social invitations.

From the first he was fascinated by the freedom from restraint in thought and action that prevailed in the house. No doubt I was straitlaced, but what he thought delightful I thought wrong. It seemed to me, from what he said, that Mrs. Norland was a very immoral woman. Certainly she had no religion whatever. When I saw Ben gradually forsaking all I so clung to, when he refused to go to church with me, and began to beg me not to go; when he said, openly, that when we were married I must give all that up; when, at last he began to deny the existence of a Diety, and say, as they did at the Norland's, that man had no soul that all ended here, and that to be happy while we lived should be our only object, my heart sank within me. I loved him so dearly that I was quite willing to marry him if he would let me go in my own way. I believed that my influence and perhaps my prayers might win him back to heaven.

A young man with good principles would surely do what was right at last, but when he began to talk of forbidding me to listen to the good words I heard in church, or even to kneel [illegible] at home, I felt that I should [illegible] wrong to promise to obey him, and that there could be no hope for a home divided against itself.

I shall not tell you what particular sect I belonged to—that does not matter. All Christians worship God and try to follow Jesus and [illegible] that he might, out of [illegible] me, give me my own way. I [illegible] hardly have spoken with him—such is the weakness of woman's heart—but that tales reached me that made me feel that he was not true to me.

It was hard for a girl to speak of such a thing as the beguiling of her lover's heart by a wicked married woman; but I had no one to speak for me, and with my first words we quarreled. He called me an old fashioned little Pharise, and said that my husband would be a slave if I had my way—a slave to superstitions of all sorts; that he was a man, and knew what was right and best; that I need not think that he should never look at a pretty face or take a glass of wine with a friend.

At the moment he was flushed with what he had been drinking at the Norlands'. He said more than he meant, no doubt, but it spurred me on to do what I had resolved to do and at last I said:

"Benjamin Rue, just here where we now sit I promised to marry you; here I take back that promise. We should only make each other wretched for life."

All he answered was:

"No doubt you are right."

And then I took my ring from my finger and gave it to him. He turned away, and I heard his feet amongst the rustling autumn leaves long after I could see him.

And it was all over—all over! And then indeed I wept and wished that I could die just there where I had been so happy.

Time passed, and I grew used to it. As for Ben, he got on well. Fashionable people "called him in." In fact, he was the fashionable doctor of the place, and had an office in the handsomest portion of the town. For my part, I kept my school, and boarded with the motherly old widow who had been kind to me when I first came to the place a stranger.

My happiest day was the Sabbath, which I spent in church, teaching my little ones and attending all the services; and then I tried to think only of heaven and its joys, and to do what good I could. But I cannot say I was ever more than quietly cheerful—the brightness had gone out of my life.

It is natural for young people to look forward to something and to enjoy their lives, and I think that God meant that every girl should have a lover and every woman a husband and children of her own, and that we should all be grateful for the good things he has given us and take our own share.

I might have had lovers—I might have married—but, with all his faults, I could not care for any one as I did for Benjamin Rue; and a wretched thing indeed would married life be without true tenderness. I was on my way to be a spinster.

As for Ben, one day there was a great scandal in the town. He had had a quarrel with Mr. Norland about his wife. More than a quarrel—blows had been struck, shots fired. The woman's character was now entirely gone; their home was broken up.

Mr. Noland sought a divorce and gained it. Respectable people dropped a doctor who had such evil notoriety, and one day I heard that he had left Johnstown.

"Better for him," I thought, "the quiet life he would have led with me—better even from a worldly point of view." And still I believed what he had sought to prove—that he had only been free and foolish, not criminal.

And again time passed on without any new events of importance coming into my life, and I expected to live and die in Johnstown a school teaching spinster—Johnstown, of which the rest of the world knew nothing to speak of.

You all know how sadly it became famous one wild day. I shall never forget that day for many reasons.

I had just given my scholars their summer holiday and had my time to myself, and I had been all through the rain to see a poor, sick woman who was quite destitute. The good widow with whom I lived was away, she had gone to another State to visit a married daughter, and the house was lonely. I had heard that Dr. Rue was in the place—that he had come down to see about some lots of ground, almost worthless when he bought them, but lately become valuable—and at every step I half feared, half hoped to meet him. The idleness of my holiday left me time to think of myself, and I was very sorrowful.

As I passed the church door it stood open, and an impulse led me enter.

An old woman was dusting the cushions, polishing the pew doors, and setting books in order in the racks, and I went forward to the front of the church and sat down before a painted window I loved to look at. Jesus, the Shepherd, with the lamb on his arms, smiled on me as though between earth and heaven.

I began to feel a strange peace steal over me—a promise of happiness. My heart went forth to my old love, and for all the pain he had given me I forgave him. I hoped that he was leading a better life and thinking better thoughts.

I remember saying to myself that so I should like to feel on the day of death—loving all men and having no fear whatever of the mysteries beyond this life, whatever they might prove to be.

I think that I had fallen asleep listening to the wind and the beat of the rain upon the roof, when suddenly I was aroused by screams and cries. People came rushing into the church, crying out in terror. The water was already making a pond of the place, and those who sought safety had climbed to the pulpit or rushed up to the gallery.

As I stood dazed and trembling an arm seized me about the waist. "The dam is down!" shouted a voice in my ear. I was hurried away up beyond the gallery into the bell tower. The crowd followed us and now we saw the water coming down toward us like a great black wall. Such a sight was never seen!

I turned to look into the face of the man who had helped me to the loft. I had no doubt as to who he was even before I looked, but when I saw Benjamin Rue I felt happy and had no fear. Death was before me; but he had sought me, hoping to save me, and in his arms I should die.

"God have mercy on our souls!" said I.

He answered:

"Amen!"

He helped me to a little wooden hood above the belfry, and there we clung together. It was the highest point we could reach. The waters were at hand.

"Forgive me," he said in my ear. "Forgive me, Agnes; I have repented, heaven knows—and I never was as wicked as they made me out. I flirted with Mrs. Norland. I admired her, but I did not wrong her husband; he lied when he swore that he believed it. He wanted to marry another woman. I have loved you all along; I came back to tell you so and win you again if I could. I am a better man."

All I could do was to answer him with a kiss, for at that moment the black water struck the church.

Then I was floating, floating—beaten this way and then that; but his arms were always about me. Some broken plank gave us support; I never moved, but I prayed without ceasing; I prayed to be saved with him or to die with him, as was God's will.

And others prayed—prayed earnestly as I—better people—and yet were drowned. Let no vainglorious fancy that my prayer was better than theirs seem to dwell in my heart, for indeed it is not there; but I am humbly thankful that God saw fit to let me live a little longer and that at last, cast upon dry land, we knew that days were given us in which to live together.

It was sad and terrible indeed to stand hand in hand and look upon what seemed almost the destruction of the world. We shall never forget it or be as glad as if we had not seen it, but we were the world to each other after all.

I am Ben's wife to-day, and I believe him to be a good man. As for me, may I know my own faults too well to be severe on any of his I may discover.—Mary Kyle Dallas.

Society Rosebud—"Then you think that Jack cares for me?"

Old Stager—"I'm sure of it. His eyes followed you every movement last night."

(Alarmed)—"Gracious! Do you really think he saw all I ate at the supper?"

Mrs. Youngwife (three months after marriage)—Charlie, dear, let me shave you some time, will you?"

Mr. Youngwife—"No, my darling, I can't trust you with a razor, you might cut your little fingers."

Mrs. Youngwife (three years after marriage)—"Charlie, let me shave you will you?"

Mr. Youngwife—"No, old woman, you'd be sure to cut my throat, let alone spoiling the razor. Take the carving knife and go practice on the butter."

Jordan is a Hard Road to Travel.

In a word, Jordan is a hard road to travel, and what with the tariff tiger and the pension elephant, it will be simply a mercy of God if the administration gets out of the jungles alive. In six months there will be discord worse confounded. In 12, the surplus will be gone, and the Treasury will be shinnying around to raise the money necessary to defray the expenses of the Government. So, with the vote of Tuesday behind it, and hell itself before, the Republican outlook is about as reassuring as that which faced the gentleman in tde fable, who found himself betwixt the devil and the deep, blue sea.

All things augur well for the Democracy. In the first place, we are right: right on tha great questions of the day. In the second place, we have had it out among ourselves, and are a unit in head and heart. And, finally, God has raised us at least three new leaders one in New Jersey, one in Ohio and one in Iowa, so that we are no longer limited to a single State, or individual, for a national standard-bearer in 1892, but may pick and choose from a good field, selecting him, who, as events shall disclose, is fittest to lead and surest to win.

Let the dead past bury its dead. Turn to the glorious future. The Democratic sun is in the ascendant. Be that sun at once our guide and oriflamme as it rises in the Heavens, a sure harbinger of Democratic triumph in 1892.—Henry Watterson in the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Lincoln on Corporations.

"Yes, we may congratulate ourselves that this cruel war is nearly to a close. It has cost a vast amount of treasure blood. The best blood of the flower of the American youth has been freely offered upon our country's altar that the nation might live. It has been indeed, a trying hour for the Republic, but I see in the near future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of our country. As a result of the war, corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruptions in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working up the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before, even in the midst of war. God grant that my suspicions may prove groundless."

The largest family in Wetzel County, W. Va., consists of eighteen persons—father, mother eight sons and eight daughters.

HOME NEWS

—Right cold.

—Snow, snow and still it snows.

—Some cases before justice Grose last week.

—For nice job printing, call at THE TIMES office.

—The roads are in a dreadful condition, from the recent rains.

—Next Thursday, 28th, is thanksgiving.

—We would like to have a bushel of small white beans.

—Send us the news from your post office.

—Several wagons passed through town this week for the depot.

—E. H. Moore, of Academy was in town last Saturday.

—Several drummers in town the past week.

—S. L. Gibson, Esq., of Frost passed through town to-day (Wednesday) with some fine cattle.

—Messrs. N. Stolting and J. M Cutlip of Academy spent Monday night in our city.

—Fix up the sidewalks, and keep out of mud a half a foot deep this winter.

—Fifty-six indictments were made at the last term of the Circuit Court in Greenbrier Co., for violating the liquor law.

—We are indebted to our excellent merchants Mr. A. Barlow and Mess. Loury & Doyle for business favors lately.

—There is comfort for the man with a prematurely gray beard in Buckingham's Dye, because it never fails to color an even brown or black as may be desired.

—J. C. Loury, Jr., went down to Academy last Saturday and returned Monday, accompanied by Miss Lucy Renick, who will visit friends and relatives in our city for a short time.

—We are under many obligations to our young friend Davis Dilley Esq., for some of the nicest apples we have ever had the pleasure of sticking a tooth into.

—The marriage license market has been quite dull for some time. Now we don't know what the cause of this is, but we, with all seriousness, would advise our young men to get married and—and—subscribe for THE TIMES.

—The Lady Godiva must have had exceptionally long hair since it completely concealed her lovely person. Since Ayer's Hair Vigor came into use such examples are not so rare as formerly. It not only promotes the growth of the hair, but gives it a rich, silken texture.

—We will furnish to all new subscribers and old ones who pay up and a year in advance the National Democrat, a purely Democratic 7 column 8 page paper, published at Washington, D. C., and THE TIMES for $1.75. The National Democrat alone would cost you $1.50.

—Boils, carbuncles, and other skin eruptions indicate that the system is endeavoring to reject poisonous acids, and that Ayer's Sarsaparilla is imperatively needed. It is the most reliable of all blood medicines. Ask your druggist for it, and take no other.

Killed by a Falling Tree.

As we go to press, we learn of the death of Randolph Harris, (col.) a few hours ago, about two miles from this place. The particulars, as we learn, are, that one Titus Carter, (col.) was cutting down a tree, when Randolph came along and stopped below the tree to talk, and Titus told him to get out of the way, that it was ready to fall, but before he could get away the tree fell and struck him, killing him instantly.

Meeting.

A meeting of very marked religious interest held by Rev. S. C. Morgan at the Edray Church for nearly three weeks past has just closed, and resulted in the conversion of about thirty persons, among them, several young men. Very large congregations attended and the behavior of all was exceptionally good. Xx.

Green Bank Items.

Died, Nov. 5th, 1889, Minnie Lee, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Lightner, of diptheria, aged nearly five years.

There are no new cases of diphtheria and it is hoped that this much dreaded disease has died out in this community.

Messrs. McKerr, R. N. Gum and his son Wm., are at home on a visit from Randolph Co., where they have been working during the past summer and fall.

PAULINA.

Traveler's Repose Locals.

Mrs. Charlie Burner is quite ill at the time of this writing.

Messrs. Granville, Caswell, Keller and Jacob Arbogast, killed four deer while out hunting one day last week.

Miss Lena Burner who has been at Dr. Ligon's for some time past, returned to her home at this place last Sunday.

Col. Driscoll and Mr Swecker of Dunmore, made a flying trip to this place last week.

Maj. Arbogast and wife of Green Bank, spent last Saturday, and Sunday, visiting Mrs. A's sick sister, Mrs. Burner.

Mrs. Sarah Gum and Mrs. Maupin of Green Bank, who have been visiting friends in this neighborhood for a week or two, returned home last Saturday.

Mr. O. W. S. Gum is off on a trip to Elkins.

Mr. Jim Stone is thinking of purchasing finger rings by the gross so as to be able to supply all the girls he waits on.

The new school house out at Mr. Lafayette Burners, has been completed and is now ready for use.

The Ministers who have been holding the meeting at Pine Grove school house are still having good success. Up to this time there has been twenty-seven conversions and there is still ten penitents.

WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15.—Senator Blackburn is one of the most popular, if not the most popular man, in public life, with the "boys." A little incident that occurred here this week shows how he obtains and how he keeps that popularity. He has a friend here who is in the toils of the law. An application was to be made in his favor to one of the local courts and "Joe" Blackburn, as nine people out of every ten here call the junior Senator from Kentucky, was asked to join several other lawyers in this move on behalf of the prisoner. He readily consented, but at the last minute it was discovered that Senator Blackburn was not a member of the local bar. Did he allow that to freeze him out of the case? Not a bit of it. He had himself admitted to the bar and took his place with the prisoner's other counsels and now the prisoner is out on bail.

This has been a great week for our Catholic fellow citizens. First they celebrated their centennial in Baltimore. Then on Wednesday they dedicated their big University here. The dedication ceremonies were attended by the President, Vice President, the entire cabinet, several justices of the Supreme Court and quite a number of Senators and Representatives. At the banquet which followed the ceremonies Secretary Blaine responded to the toast "Our Country and our President," in a manner that has won the commendation of everybody.

The Three America's Congress is back in Washington but owing to the fatigue of its members, regular sittings will not begin until next week. The delegates are enthusiastic over what they saw during their forty days trip around the country.

Mr. Wanamaker does not like the name of "Ananias" which Senator Hamptons stinging letter has hung to his coat tail for the rest of his life.

In view of the fact that Vice President Morton's big apartment house in this city has become or bids fair to become a National issue, your correspondent deems it only fair to say that there is no bar room, as such a place is commonly known, in the building, but, in one end of the cafe there are a number of tables at which you can sit and be served with all the liquor you care to pay for.

Senator Sherman has returned from Ohio in the best of humors. He finds it impossible to hide his elation over Foraker's defeat. Here's what he said to a newspaper man: "We are defeated as everybody knows, but the republican party has been defeated in Ohio before with the result of doing it good." Could anything be plainer than that? As soon as Mr. Sherman arrived here he went to the White House, presumably to congratulate Mr. Harrison on the summary removal of what looked at one time like a dangerous rival of his in 1892. Doubtless President Harrison chuckled as he thought that the Ohio election removed two rivals instead of one as Mr. Sherman thinks. For just as certain as Sherman helped to remove Foraker in 1889 will Foraker help to "down" Sherman in 1892. It isn't often that your correspondent indulges in making predictions, but this paragraph to be fully appreciated should be put away until the Summer of 1892.

President Harrison's message is complete. It will not be printed before its delivery to Congress, as has been the custom for many years past. Fearing that it may be prematurely published President Harrison has decided that only two or three type-writer copies of it shall be made for the press associations, and they are to be made in the White House and not given out until it is known that the reading of it has been begun at the Capitol.

It begins to look as if there would be no fight over the speakership. The only candidate that does not appear to be afraid of "big Tom Reed" as the Representative from Maine is generally called here, is Representative Cannon. He tried to get the other candidates to join him in a combination against Reed, but they all decline. Things may grow more exciting as the number of members in town increases, but unless the opposition shall make a great deal more showing than it has so far done, the big Maine man is as good as elected speaker.

One of Washington's most prominent printers has been discharged from the Government printing office because while on the street on the night of the recent elections, he gave a cheer over the bulletined announcement that Ohio had gone democratic.

If democrats here are correctly informed the next democratic Senator from Ohio will be either John R. McLean or Calvin S. Brice.

Moving a Bridge.

The Norwich Bulletin says recently the Pennsylvania railroad wanted a big iron bridge, 258 feet long and weighing 25,000 tons, moved from its place over Mill Creek, near Lancaster, to a new site forty-five feet away. Master Carpenter Beard took the job. He had 100 men to help him. He made his preparations leisurely, and, when the last train had passed over the bridge, with his hundred men and his trestles, rollers, jacks and cranes he set to work. In just fifty eight minutes from the time the work began the bridge was in its new place and a freight train of such size as to require two locomotives was passing over it. Now the ancients couldn't have done that in the same time if they had had 10,000 men. What we know about iron and its uses and how to work it is worth more to the world than all the lost arts of all past ages combined.

The United States is credited with 10,319 papers of all sorts, 1,494 of them being dailies.

A Chinaman is about to enter the law department of Michigan University.

Secretary Blaine has moved into the old Seward house in Washington.

Large fortunes sometimes have queer beginnings. The Gardiner (Me.) News says that one of the wealthiest firms in that state began business on $5,000, which a sister of the partners got in a breach of promise suit for damages against a rich man.

The Fall of Foraker

Great Foraker, and can it be
You are a buried Buckeye?
Henceforth you'll not be "Joey B"
But "Joseph th' Unluckeye."
Great Scott, Great Guns, great everything.
How soon the hopes of man take wing!
Now drop a nickel in the slot
And get a grave in a four-acre lot.

Are you the hero who spat fire
And breathed out speeches gory;
Twanged loud your red, unflagging lyre,
And thrilled the path to glory;
Said sooner could a Campbell go
A little needle's eyelet through
Than be elected Governor
While you were there to wag your jaw?

Great Hevings! No, it must not be,
Mon cher petit, oh, me child!
Rally your friends from sea to sea,
Let loose your wah-dawgs wild!
March, Joseph Benson, on the foe
Who'd rout you in your Ohio!
Give one good "rebel yell" for fun,
Then wave a flag and see them run.

"How He Did Run!"

A Virginian was showing a company of Northern men over a battle field, when one of them said:

"I am reminded of an incident which occurred here. I had charge of a gun over there near Fort Norton. One Sunday, while there was no firing going on and we were all loafing about I saw a man come over that hill by the cemetery and down across this slope toward the rear of the Confederate lines. His comfortable and serene manner irritated me. I determined to see how close I could come to him, and we all chuckled at the idea of scaring the life out of him. I took good aim and landed a shot about six feet from him. You ought to have seen him. He was the most demoralized chap you ever saw. How he did run, and now we laughed to see him!"

"So you are the man who fired that shot, are you?" said the Virginian.

"Yes; do you know anything about it?"

"Well, yes, I think I do," was the reply; "I was the fellow you shot at. I was a lad coming with some thing for my father, who was in the works. I didn't suppose there was a Yankee fool enough or mean enough to shoot a cannon at one little fellow carrying grub to his father. But you don't exaggerate the scare. I didn't grow another inch in a year."

Old Doctor—How are you coming on with your first case?

Young Doctor—Well, I haven't got the invalid out of his bed yet.

"Not out of his bed yet! Great Esculapius! "Why, man, you ought to have had him in his grave by this time."

Mistress—"It seems you haven't got sense enough to know how long to let the eggs stay in the water. Did they never have any soft-boiled eggs for breakfast where you served before you came here?"

New Servant—"No, indeed. The lady where I served before I came here was so kind hearted that she never allowed me to boil an egg."

"Are you going to deny that charge you made against me in yesterday's paper?" he thundered at the editor.

"No, sir!!" thundered back the editor.

"That's right," he said quickly, "if there is one thing I admire it is a man who sticks by his convictions."

"I'd like to ask you, sir," said the young man, in hesitating tones "might I—might I—marry your daughter?"

"Humph," replied her father. "You might——"

"Thanks, sir."

"You might, I repeat, but it would be one of the most inexplicable accidents that ever happened in this country."

"Here's a pointer for ye, Bill," said a tramp to one of his companions. "Don't never go to that house on the hill yonder."

"Why not?"

"'Cause whenever they've got pie they haven't any cheese, and when they've got cheese they haven't any pie. I wouldn't eat at no such place as that."

Wickwire—"What have you got your coat all buttoned up for, Yabsley? You surely are not suffering from the cold this warm evening?"

Yabsley—"I'm going to see my best girl, and I've got on a necktie she bought for me the other day at a dry goods store."

Will—"I don't feel like myself at all, this morning."

Bill—"What's the matter?"

Will—"Oh, I am all out of sorts."

Bill—"Well, your case isn't half so bad as mine—I'm all out of money.

Little Freddy (aged six)—"Mamma's the nicest lady in the whole world, papa's the nicest man and sister Ethel is the nicest girl."

Mr. Stickney (who is courting sister Ethel)—"What am I, Freddy?"

Little Freddy—"You's nobody."

"See here, do you want to ruin me entirely?" he shouted as he flung a pair of trouser's on the tailor's table. "Those pants are two inches too long."

"Nonesense. They are the best fitting trousers I have ever cut."

"That may all be true," he said, "but I couldn't maintain my literary reputation an hour if I were seen with them on."

Landlord—"Well, sir, how did you sleep last night?"

Guest—"Oh, first rate, until along to-ward morning the trains woke me up."

Lanlord—"There are no trains through here in the morning, sir. It must have been our new hash machine."

Dolly—"That seems to be a good rule which Mr. Gladstone and his wife observe."

Cumso—"What is it?"

"When he insists his wife submits when she insists he submits."

"Yes, that's a good rule. My wife and I follow it, too—at least the last part of it."

Young Man (somewhat agitated)—"I have called, Mr. Means, to ask permission to pay my addresses to your daughter, Miss Ruth."

Banker Means—"My daughter Ruth, Mr. Peduncle? Why, she is engaged to Mr. Swackhammer."

Young Man (still agitated, but reflecting that all is not yet lost)—"Did you think I said Miss Ruth, Mr. Means? I said Miss Gwendolen. The—er—similarity of the names probably caused you to misunderstand me."

Laura—"I tell you, Emily, I will never marry a man who doesn't love me!"

Emily—"And I will never love a man who doesn't marry me."

Physician—"You must have made some big blunder in cleaning my watch. It won't run at all now."

Watchmaker (taking the watch)—"I will put it in good order. A jeweler's blunders are easily repaired."

"There goes a man whom I should say labors under some peculiar trouble."

"You are right, my boy. He is a man whose wife is better known than himself."

Customer (in cheap restaurant)—"Waiter, bring me a napkin, please."

Waiter—"All in use at present, Cap; but that chap with the heavy moustache eating soup over there will be through with his soon."

Editor—"You want to run right down into the press room and get caught in a belt. It will be an easy death compared with the one you will have otherwise."

Proofreader—"Why, what's up?"

Editor—"What's up? Why, in this account of the Comeoff's ball, in the description of Miss Teteatete's dress, the copy she gave me read 'trimmed with a jabot of pale seraphane,' and you let it go 'trimmed with a job lot of pale seraphane.' Go on downstairs and commit suicide—I'll write up a good account of your death."

THE DISTRICT SCHOOL.

"Come on dear," said Amy, putting up her parasol.

"Dear" came, a chubby five year-old.

"We'll take a stroll up the road, Malcolm," said his young aunt.

"All wight," said Malcolm.

They had come, Malcolm and his parents and his father's pretty sister, to pass the summer in Gloster.

Gloster was only a hamlet, but it was cool and green and delightful.

"We'll go along by this stone wall, dear," said Amy.

They passed a maple grove; a little, old church, some farm houses, and then came suddenly upon a square, white building, with two doors in front and yellow blinded windows. Out of the doors bare footed children, with dinner pails, were coming.

"A district school" said Amy. "And it looks so much like—But of course you don't remember, Malcolm. You were only two years old.

Smiling in a pleasantly retrospective way, Amy strolled up to the door.

She would have a congelial little chat with the teacher. Probably it was a spinster with a pointed nose and a shoulder shawl, but—

She and Malcolm went in, and the teacher rose from the desk.

He was hardly a spinster! He was a tall, bright-eyed, dark moustached, indisputably good-looking young man.

"Oh!" Amy faltered.

"Come in!" said the schoolmaster, though they were in.

Amy mustered her courage. It was embarrassing, but after all it didn't alter the case. She would have her congenial talk just the same.

"We thought we'd come in," she said, sweetly smiling. "You see, I taught a term in a district school once myself, and——

"Certainly," said the master. "I am always glad to have visitors. I'm sorry my school is out."

He hastened forward to meet her, and walked back down the aisle with her.

"I'd have been glad to see it," said Amy—not very regretfully, however. "See, Malcolm, dear, that rat on the blackboard."

"Yes, I illustrate their lessons for my primer children," said the teacher, laughing. "They like my pictorial efforts."

What a pleasant laugh he had, and what a clearness and gaiety in his eyes!

Amy's heart beat a little faster.

"It's such work, isn't it, teaching, babies?" she said. "I had an infant of three in my school."

"Oh, I draw the line there! But I have them as small as this young man."

He pinch Malcolm's fat cheek.

"Malcolm is five," said Amy. "Have you many pupils? I had only sixteen."

"Oh, I can beat that! I have forty."

"And you, do it all?" said Amy, her admiring eyes raised to his. "I'm afraid I'm presumptuous to try to have a congenial talk," she laughed, ambiguously. "You see, I taught only one term. I was spending the summer at Hinton, and the teacher was taken sick the first of the term, and I taught it for her. But I'm afraid I did it for fun."

"I shall rank you among the pedagogues, all the same," the young schoolmaster declared, gaily. "You've taught a school, and the [illegible] of your [illegible] doesn't matter. I don't know why we can't have a congenial talk."

"Perhaps we can," said Amy, with pretty laughter and a blush.

They had it.

Malcolm, sitting close to his pretty aunt on the bench, listened round-eyed, interested if not comprehending.

Amy wondered afterward how ever they drifted from school methods and monthly examinations to the prettiness of Gloster's rambles and the pleasantness of the Clark's front porch, where Amy boarded, and the excellence of their croquet ground. But they did; and they were honestly amazed when the clock on the wall gave its "tchick" for half-past five.

They looked at each other in flushed alarm.

Their acquaintance was an hour and a half old.

"I've hindered you!" Amy cried. "You've got lessons to make out, or something."

"I haven't," retorted the teacher, with a bright laugh. "I was going home. I live beyond the Clarks', and I hope you'll let me go with you."

"Come, Malcolm dear," said Amy turning aside her smiling face.

"I don't suppose you will care for my commencement," said the schoolmaster, at the Clarks' gate. "It's day after to-morrow evening. I call it commencement in some irony—its the mere stepping off of my higher class. Only its something of a celebration, here, you know. Everybody comes, and the school-board and my graduates and I ornament the platform put for the occasion, and it's a grand time—for Gloster. But, It wouldn't pay you."

"But I shall come, of course, said Amy, and then blushed for having said "of course."

But the schoolmaster looked happy.

She went up the path in a smiling daze. Indeed it had been a congenial talk—amazingly congenial!

"Yes, Gloster's pretty quiet," said Mr. Clark at the supper table. "I 'spose commencement, now,'ll have to last us rest o' the summer. It'll be worth seein', though. We've got as smart a teacher as you'll find. Born and brought up in Gloster, too, Phil Oakes was. Ain't but twenty-two. He's puttin' himself through college with his own hands—or his own head. Keeps up with his classes, somehow, right along with his teachin'. Goin' to have a first rate berth with his uncle in Marsden when he's bound to get educated first. He'll amount to something, Phil Oakes! Wal, you better go to commencement. You'll enj'y it."

"I shall go," Amy muttered, but tering her roll.

Commencement was drawing to a close. The audience, which was large, had listened and applauded, and tossed flowers, and vigorously fanned itself for nearly two hours. The graduates had read their essays, and the chairman of the school board had presented their diplomas and made a short address.

Now it was the turn of the young master, and the audience gave him a little round of cheers as he rose to speak the parting words to the graduates. For Phil Oakes was certain to say something worth hearing.

So he did. The conventional sentiments about the voyage of life and the port of success were [illegible] neglected. The young master's speech, was short, but good; terse, but bright and interesting and amusing.

Amy looked and listened.

She was with her brother and sister in law, and she was rather in doubt as to the thing she intended doing; but she did not falter.

How nice he looked! And his bright eyes were turned toward her more than once. And she determined to do it if it was eccentric.

She grasped firmly the handsome nose-gay of flowers she had carefully arranged, red and white and yellow roses, with a border of delicate ferns, and as the young master bowed, amid sincere applause, she threw it with vigor directly at him.

There was a general laugh at the novel feature, and then a spreading "Ah!" of consternation.

The big bunch had hit the rather rickety lamp on the organ and knocked it to the floor. There was the expected crash of breaking glass; but worse, there was a burst of flame. The oil had caught fire.

Of course there was a panic. Even men, in their first fright, pushed toward the door. Women screamed and children cried.

Everybody was certain that the building would burn, and there was a general rush and hubbub.

But Amy stood still. Her sister-in-law had grown almost hysterical and her brother had borne her out and called to Amy to follow.

But she did not. She stood motionless and watched one figure on the platform.

Phil Oakes had snatched up the carpet from the temporary platform, and was valiantly smothering the flames.

Amy waited. She had done it. If he was badly burned—if he was smothered—it would be her fault—hers! And how differently she had meant it! She had been foolish, but surely she did not deserve that her foolishness should be to his injury.

The time she stood miserably waiting—waiting till he should see and come to her, as she knew he would (for he must know from whom that bouquet had come)—the time seemed endless.

When he came, white faced but smiling, the tears rushed to her anxious eyes.

"I was such a goose!" she said. "What made me do it? You are burned—both your hands—and I did it!"

"No, no! A small burn or two—nothing!" said the schoolmaster, looking handsome as he bent toward her. "Don't think it! I have your flowers, and they are worth it! Are you alone? Let me take you home."

She took his arm. He was not much hurt, and he held her flowers tightly in his hand, and they were going out into the cool night together, and she was almost glad.

For otherwise she would be going home with John and Margaret.

"My sister in law was hysterical with fright," said Amy, laughing and half crying together, and almost hysterical herself. "And my brother took her home. He told me to come, but I—"

"Your brother!" said Mr. Oakes.

"Yes."

"And your sister in law?"

"Why, yes."

"But I haven't seen them!" he expostulated.

"But you haven't called on me," Amy retorted, dryly.

"And I thought you were alone," he declared.

"But I'm not," she replied, [illegible] ering.

The schoolmaster stopped short, and faced her.

"Is it possible," he said, solemnly,—"is it possible that that child is your nephew?"

"Of course! What else could he be?" Amy cried.

There was a silence of some minutes.

"I thought he was your—son," said Phil Oakes, almost inaudibly. "I thought you were a widow."

"A widow!" she gasped.

She leaned against the fence and laughed until she was weak.

"I was sure you were a widow," he said. "You had on a black dress, you know."

"With yellow bows on it!" she replied in a soft scream.

"And the little boy was with you."

"Oh, yes! Malcolm loves me And Margaret was away that day."

"And he looks like you."

"Yes, everybody says so."

"And you called him 'dear.' And I thought he called you 'mammy.'"

"Aunt Amy," she corrected, faint with laughter.

"I see," said the schoolmaster, slowly. "Do you know," he added, gazing down upon her, "that it has worried me ever so much? Somehow I didn't like to think of you being a widow. I liked you," said the schoolmaster, rather breathlessly. "I liked you right away. That was a congenial talk, wasn't it? and I—I admired you. But I was entirely persuaded that you were a widow with a young, hopeful, and somehow I didn't like the idea in the least. On my soul I don't know why," said the young man, laughing as he looked down upon her.

And he didn't know, though he blushed as he said it, and though she of the rose-boqnet had her pretty fase turned away.

But he knew later. The summer was long, and the Clarks' front porch and croquet ground were rich in opportunity. When the young schoolmatter went back to college in the fall he left a modest diamond ring behind him. And when, two years later, the bright graduate went to fill a remunerative position in Marsden, he, took his young wife with him.—Saturday night.

Driftwood Doings.

More rain and mud.

Our school is flourishing under the management of Miss Lulu M. Burner, of Green Bank.

Miss Emma McAlpin, who has been visiting in this neighborhood for the past week has returned home, accompanied by Miss Susie Weeks.

It is rumored that a wedding is soon to take place in our neighborhood.

Rev. Jno. McNeel closed his protracted meeting last Sunday.

Mr. Uriah Hevener removed some of his cattle from the Huffman backing this week.

Dunmore Doings.

As we have seen nothing from Tom Sawyer for some time we suppose he is as dead as Billy Mahone.

We are having all sorts of weather, and mud, and some of the roads are almost impassable. We must have better roads or stop traveling.

We have some good R. R. news again.

The best thing W. Va., can do is to stop the free schools for two years, and apply the money to the roads and bridges, so that all may be benefitted thereby.

Mr. Newton Moore and Wm. Carpenter are very ill at this writing.

Our school is flourishing. Miss Jones has a large class of music scholars and expects to teach music at Dunmore when her school is out.

Jacob Taylor has gone into the lumber business.

There will be singing at the Baxter church Saturday night and music on the new organ. Come and bring your books. Preacking Sunday at 3 p. m.

Pocahontas Musical Association.

A very interesting and prosperous meeting of this association was held in the Mary Gibson Chapel Oct 24th, 26th, 1889.

This institution has exerted a very fine influence in promoting a taste for sacred music and developing social amenities in our grand and improving county, wherever its sessions have been held the past six or eight years.

The meeting on Elk was opened Thursday evening by the President Sam'l B. Moore at whose request Wm. T. Price read a scripture lesson, sang a hymn, beginning

"Sweet is the work my God and king
To praise thy name, give thanks and sing."

and offered prayer.

There was an increasing attendance to the last and the interest taken by the people young and old was extensely gratifying.

Messrs. S. B. Moore, Jacob Smith, John Waugh, Kenney Gay, Wm. T. Price, led the singing, and gave the lectures. Mr. Luther Sharp, a young beginner of marked promise, was induced to lead in one piece, which he did to the satisfaction of all.

The presence of Prof. C. B. Swecker one of the founders of the association and one of its most efficient supported was much missed as well as that of others.

Mr. Ellis Hannah, performed the duties of secretary, with much ability.

Mr. William Gibson, James Gibson his brother and others entertained the visiting members very sumptuously, and through them and several others, the Association has a standing invitation to come there and stay long enough to eat two or more beeves, and other good things in proportion.

What a nice world would there be were there more Billy Gibsons Jim Gibsons, John B. Hannah's and Clark Riders to move up things with wives to correspond.

Died.

[From (Ord, Neb.,) Democrat of the 14 inst.]

Mr. William Butler Lockridge died at the family residence in Michigan township last Friday, after a long and tedious illness, his bedside being surrounded by his aged father, two brothers, and a few kind friends and neighbors. Mr. Lockridge was born in West Virginia about 33 years ago and came to Valley county in 1884 in company with his brother Lee, and shortly afterward was followed by his father and younger brother Gus. The brothers secured a large tract of land and opened up an extensive cattle and grain ranche, which they have operated since. About a year ago the subject of this sketch took cold from the result of wading the river and was attacked with lung trouble which ran into consumption. He fought this dire monster manfully, but without avail. During the entire period of his sickness he seemed mindful of its fatality and demeaned himself with great patience and forbearance, and never for a moment appeared despondendt. Some time before his death Mr. Lockridge united with the Ord Presbyterian church and went down to the valley and shadow of death professing full and complete faith in the saviour of mankind. His remains were interred in the Ord cemetery Sunday afternoon. Rev. Pearce conducted the religious exercises, making a short but oathetic address at the church upon the life and character of the deceased.

William Butler Lockridge was a quiet, unpretentious man, yet his kindly smile and cordial handshake gave token of his great large heart and liberal mind. In business he was the soul of honor, making practical application of the golden rule in every transaction with his brother man. He came west to lay up for himself riches. That he succeeded in doing this we all know. Let us hope that in the later days of his all too short life he attained those spiritual riches which the world cannot give nor take away.

[From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—President Harrison now has an opportunity to show how sincere he was when he indorsed the civil service law. In his hands has been placed a report of the civil service commission showing the violation of the law by republican officials by the collecting of money for the Mahone campaign fund. The Commissioners say that their report is accompanied by evidence which leaves no doubt of the guilt of the parties, and that whether they shall be punished or not lies entirely with the President. It is intimated that at least two of the Commissioners will resign if the President refuses to order the prosecution of the guilty parties. What the result will be is hard to say. But I don't see why President Harrison should hesitate a minute. Laws, whether good or bad, are made to be enforced.

The new Commissioner of Pensions is up to snuff when it comes to getting around the Civil Service law. Here's a specimen case: the first or second day the commissioner was in office he promoted a watchman to be superintendent of the Pension office building. this week the same man was transferred to a high grade clerkship and a new man was made superintendent. Wasn't that a slick way of making the watchman a high priced clerk without submittting him to a civil service examination? Is it any wonder that people here who are necessarily familiar with such cases as this should consider the whole civil service business, as at present conducted a farce? Mr. Raum has also developed another trait peculiar to republican officials—that of looking out for their families has created a new division in his office and appointed his son to be its chief at a salary of $2,000 a year.

Now that Secretary Proctor has resigned the presidency of his Vermont marble company, he will be able to devote his entire time to the War department and to the laying of wires to succeed Senator Morrill.

The Speakership contest, although very quiet, is developing a great deal of bad blood among the republicans. Representative Cannon and his friends are extremely bitter against Reed, and are striving hard to bring about a combination that will defeat him, in fact that is the only reason that Cannon ever became a candidate. He has never had the remotest chance of being nominated, and no one knows it better than himself, but he has not yet given up the hope of "downing" Reed. McKinley, who would be looked on as the winner if Reed was out of the way, is having a fight made on him from several quarters. Senator Quay says that McKinley shall never be Speaker if he can prevent it, and he thinks he can. Foraker too, it is said, is bringing the little influence he has to bear against McKinley. It grows worse as the time approaching for the holding of the caucus, all of which is very encouraging to the democrats, for it makes it absolutely certain that no objectionable legislation will get through the House as long as this bickering among the majority lasts.

President Harrison promised a committee of the National convention of Commercial bodies, which called on him this week, that he would consider the question of recommending in his annual message the adoption of a national bankrupt law.

The proposition of Mr. Arkell, Russell Harrison's partner, to pay $1,000,000 for the privilege of putting an advertisement on the back of postage stamps will be rejected. Uncle Sam does not believe in running opposition to the newspapers, which he considers the best, and the only legitimate advertising mediums.

There seems to be a screw loose somewhere in the republican machine, or else United States Treasurer Houston, who during the Presidential campaign was chairman of the Indiana republican state committee, would hardly have taken pains to use the language he did, when he appointed Miss Tanner, daughter of the deposed "Corporal" to be his private secretary, just after Mr. Raum, her father's successor had accepted her resignation of a similar position in his office. Mr. Houston told the young lady that it afforded him much pleasure to be able to show his appreciation of the valuable services rendered the republican party of Indiana by her father, Corporal Tanner, during the last Presidential elections, and he told it where he knew it would be published. Isn't that treason towards the man who kicked Tanner out of the Pension office? Or was it only intended as a gentle reminder to the gentleman in the White House that he was in danger of being called ungrateful?

Between the candidates for speaker and the candidates for the smaller offices under the House, the republican Representatives are having a hard time, and it is not to be wondered at that they are slow in turning up.

Mr. Carlisle will receive the democratic nomination for speaker of the House. No other man has ever been thought of in this connection.

Two Ways to Propose.

Here are two kinds of "proposing." This one is the kind you read about, but the other is the most popular in the realm of fact: "My angel, I have long waited for this opportunity. You must have detected ere now the growth of my love for you. From the day I first met you that love took root, and to-night it is strong and sturdy, unwavering, undying. Your sweet smiles have lighted up my life, your every word has been to me a note of exquisite music, thrilling, enthralling me. You have filled a place in my heart, in my affections, that no one before has ever occupied. My life-long happiness depends solely upon the answer you give me. Say you will be mine to love, caress and cherish, idolize through time and eternity, and make me of all men most envied. But if you refu——Oh, I cannot! I cannot! The thought is madness. You will be my wife! I see the answer of your heart mirrored in your lustrous eyes; you know I love you as no other man ever has loved you, or ever can love you, darling. I know you will not thrust me off."

The angel assumes a stereotyped really-this-is-so sudden expression, and assures Mr. Wordie she would derive great pleasure from being his sister.

Here is the other way:

"Maud, I've been thinking seriously lately."

"Really, Fred, you ought to be more judicious than to do anything so rash as that."

"Yes, I know it is a heavy tax on my mental capacity, but then I always was reckless that way. This time, however, I think I have been thinking you wouldn't object to having your name changed."

"When?"

"Just as soon as possible."

"Will it be home or church?"

"Church, of course; we want to do this thing in style."

"Have you asked pa?"

"Certainly not. I don't want to marry your father."

"Well, I know; but for form's sake."

"All right, dear; for form's sake I will see pa, and maybe you had better prepare ma for the ordeal."

"Oh, she won't mind it."

Deep silence reigns again, save as it is broken by the soft sighing of the treetops, swayed by a gentle breeze. Gleefully the stars twinkle; the moon looks beamingly down from Heaven to earth, and discovers on a vine-bowered piazza two forms with but a single chair.

Emperor William's visit to Constantinople cost the Sultan over $1,000,000.

The survivors of the London steamer Odessa, which foundered at sea, have arrived in England. They were carried down with the vessel but were blown to the surface through the boiler bursting, the explosion saving their lives.

Eastern Man—"How is Cosmopolo City, the 'Occidental Wonder of the Western World,' and 'Belle of the Plains,' prospering?"

Western Man—"Finely! Finely! We've got two stores and a blacksmith shop in full blast now."

"Any arsenic?" softly asked the little woman as the druggist came forward with his usual retail smile.

"Yes'm."

"I'd like a quarter's worth, please."

"Yes'm. How are you going to administer it?"

"Why—why, on cheese or bread, I suppose. Isn't that the general way?"

"Some give it in coffee."

"Why, rats don't drink coffee, do they?"

"Oh! its for rats, eh? Then cheese is the proper thing."

Miss Parsay (calling on Mrs. Bunscomb, picks up a card from her table)—Blodgekins! What a homely name! I'd have it changed.

Little Bobby B. (sweetly)—Is that your name?

Miss P. (also sweetly)—No. What makes you think that's my name?

Bobby—I heard mamma say you were dreadful anxious to change it.

Sounds of distress from Bobby fifteen minutes later.

Edith—I promised to marry Fred last night.

Ella—It was only last week that you told me that you really hated him.

Edith—So I did; and I meant it, too.

Ella—Then you have changed your mind. What caused you to do so?

Edith—No, I have not changed my mind; but, you see, Fred used to be a life insurance solicitor, and so he would not take "no" for an answer.

New York Judge—Prisoner, you are found guilty of murder in the first degree. Have you anything to offer to the court before sentence is passed upon you?

Prisoner—I have, your honor, I object to being executed by electricity on account of the uncertainty of its ability to destroy human life with dispatch.

N. Y. J.—Then I sentence you to work for the Delay, Linger & Wait Railway Company as freight brakeman until you are dead; and may God have mercy on your soul.

Improvements in Trotting Records.

New York Herald.

Until 1874 no horse ever trotted a mile in 2:14. In that year the feat was accomplished for the first time by Goldsmith Maid, then 17 years old. Goldsmith Maid then reighned queen of the turf four years with this record. It was unbeaten till 1878, when Rarus went a mile in 2:13¼.

This season no fewer than six horses have trotted below 2:14, and two of them are only 3 year-old. Two have scored records 2:12, and a third has made a mile in 2:10¾

These figures show a remarkable development of trotting speed in 11 years.

Sympathizing Deacon—Why do you groan so, brother?

Distressed Brother—Oh, I have been a great sinner. I have blasphemed and stolen and smoked five cent cigars and got drunk and forged and killed my man in a quarrel out in Bloody Gulch.

"Ah! well, all these things can be forgiven."

"But I haven't told the worst. I am one of those blotches on humanity who wear a stove pipe hat with a sack coat."

"I am afraid there is no help for you, sir."

The Queen of the Gnomes.

Nobody would ever have imagined that Peggy Leamington had a will of her own, or that she was anything but a charming little atom of the feminine flotsam and jetsam cast by the relentless sea of circumstances upon the barren shores of existences. Her mouth was irresolute, her eyes anything but determined looking, yet in Peggy's case appearances were decidedly deceptive. She had an undeniable will of her own, luckily for her and for the querulous old mother dependent upon her exertions.

Poor Peggy's life had been one tumultuous struggle ever since her father died. He had left his wife and daughter penniless; and even that was not the full extent of their discomfort. Mrs. Leamington felt that she had appearances—the bane of existence—to keep up; in fact, she was perfectly willing to live in threadbare uneasiness, if she could only succeed in convincing the world that she was basking in the comparative sun of luxury.

Peggy had sewed industriously night and day for a large wholesale shop that paid her but a miserable pittance, yet afforded her the means of keeping from the door the wolf—that terrible black master—the cruel extorter of so much blood-money. Mrs Leamington saw her little flat ever bright and pretty, she ate many a luxury that Peggy pathetically pretended she herself didn't like, there not being enough to "go round." Her life was as free from care as an unselfish little daughter could make it.

Then there was Jack—Jack Ruffington. Since he had come into Peggy's life things have been much more endurable. He had met the little lady at the house of her school friends, and Peggy's flaxen locks and azure eyes had charmed the susceptible young man. He didn't think he was susceptible, however. No man does. Peggy, with as much dignity as nineteen summers could command, had asked him to call and see mamma.

"I am sure you would like her," she said, after she had met Mr. Ruffington several times at this accommodating friend's house. Then she added, wickedly: "You can come and she her often, you know—when I'm out."

Peggy did not have many opportunities to indulge in those little harmless coquetries so necessary to many women. Stern realities claimed her almost entirely. The butterfly beauties of life seemed to have flitted past her. Cold, solid facts remained. Try and be coquettish, young woman, in the presence of these facts, if you can. Jack Ruffington called at Mrs. Leamington's modest apartments. He called once reluctantly; then again, with less timidity; finally he spent his almost every evening there, and seemed to enjoy it, too. There is no use beating about the bush and pretending that it was Mrs. Leamington's brilliant conversation that enchanted him. That would be absurd for two reasons. First, because the poor old lady when she spoke at all talked of nothing but the better days she had once known, and, second, because she was generally impolite enough to sleep long before Mr. Ruffington took his departure. Peggy was the attraction. She listened to all Jack's stories, sympathized with his plans for the future, and while she plied her needle and stitched away her dear life and the dear life of her mother gave him the benefit of her girlish advice. Those were delightful evenings. The stuffy little flat was a far-extending paradise; the dreamy little clock a cruel, inconsiderate time-slayer.

Then the night came when Jack asked Peggy to be his wife, and she in her enthusiasm utterly ruined a dainty lace ruffle that she had been manipulating.

"You must wait for me, Peggy," he said, looking at her blushing, coy face. "The governor has promised to raise me as soon as ever I step into Smith's place, and then Peggy—we'll have a flat larger than this, and your mother shall live with us—and—and—oh, Peggy, shall we not be happy!"

Peggy actually shed tears of joy as she looked upon the glowing picture painted by the anticipative imagination of Mr. Ruffington. Might he exact a lover's privilege and take a kiss? Peggy crimsoned at the question, but nevertheless held up her pretty face a very kissable distance and Mr. Jack made not the least ceremony. Two days later an unpretentious little engagement ring encircled Miss Leamington's pretty finger.

The girl sat thinking of all these pleasant moments one cold, dark afternoon when the days had slipped away from autumn and were speeding winterward as rapidly as possible. Since her engagement nothing but ill luck seemed to have fallen to her lot. The very next day she had received a letter from her employers at the large wholesale shop that had kept her, supplied her with work. Business was very bad, said the letter, and orders had been given to reduce expenses. Perhaps at some future time the services of Miss Leamington might be needed, but at present——

It was hard very hard, Peggy felt completely dazed. What could she do? She could not remain more than a fortnight without work. If she did, the small hoard of savings that she kept as an emergency fund would be exhausted.

She trotted patiently downtown and visited each of the big stores, determined to obtain work by some means. But the polite answer she received on all sides rendered argument impossible. She had thought of making some sort of desperate appeal to these frigid autocrats. But once in their presence and she found it impossible. Reasoning was out of the question.

"Leave your address" was the only balm volunteered, and what balm that is to the workseeker!

On her way home from this discouraging quest, her eyes were attracted by a glaring poster, fitfully lighted by a neighboring lamp. In big blue letters the announcement was made that a glittering spectacle would shortly be presented at Niblo's Garden, with "bevies of beautiful girls and hundreds of stalwart men." A sudden inspiration came to Peggy. She had been to the theatre but twice in her life and knew very little about it, but she had seen girls much uglier than she was joining in stage crowds and playing small, unimportant parts. If only she could get a chance in one of the "bevies of beautiful girls!" It would pay her better than the sewing and it would be a pleasant change. Without giving herself time for reflection she went there and then to the stage door of the big theatre and asked to see the manager of the company that was to give the production.

He came to her and she did not [illegible] when he appeared. On the contrary, she was very much on the alert and answered all questions with a self assurance that evidently pleased the gentleman who put them.

He apparently liked her appearance, and he smiled with a sort of gratitude when she said she couldn't act, and wasn't at all accomplished, because managers very rarely meet that kind of person. Applicants for positions on the stage are nearly always the greatest people on earth—in their own estimation.

"I will give you a chance, young lady," he said at last, "and will cast you for a small part called the Queen of the Gnomes. You have but a few lines to speak, and have finished at the end of the second act, when you can go home to your mother."

For Peggy had told this kindly looking manager everything. She was delighted at her luck and went home "on air." It was not till later, when her mother had fallen asleep over her knitting, that Peggy began to feel a little doubtful. She would not dare to tell Mrs. Leamington what she was going to do. The old lady had a perfect horror of theatres, and, after all, Peggy reflected, it would not be necessary to divulge her secret. She could look for work in the shops every day, and then when she found it she could resign from her queenship of the gnomes. It was absolutely necessary that she earn money. Starvation stared them in the face without it.

And Jack—no, she could not tell Jack. Mr. Ruffington would certainly not care to imagine that his affianced wife was every evening a queen of the gnomes for the benefit of a critical public. Poor Peggy! She rebelled at the idea of deception. It is easy to be frank and straightforward when there is no reason why you should be otherwise. One thing she remembered with joy. Jack was obliged to work every night now. He would not miss her. They could spend their Sundays together just the same as ever. So Peggy went to rehearsal, and was pronounced entirely competent. The work was very distasteful to her; the people with whom she came in contact disgusted her. But she associated with them as little as possible, and was careful to avoid giving offense.

Peggy's trials began during the first week. The King of the Gnomes persisted in persecuting her with attentions. He was a very objectionable creature, and she tried hard to let him see that she thought so. She longed to confide in Jack—dear, old Jack—but there she was without a soul in the world to whom she could tell her troubles. In her principal scene with the King of the Gnomes she had to tear from his face a black veil which he wore, and manifest astonishment at his features which she was supposed never to have seen before, having married him by some weird rite. The King always seized this opportunity to smile sweetly and to press her hand affectionately as possible.

One night as she reached her home, she was going to her room, tired and discouraged, when, standing in the parlor, with an angry pallor on his face, she saw Jack. In an agony of apprehension she tried to mentally formulate some excuse for her absence before she went to him, but he gave her no time. He rushed to meet her, and drew her into the room.

"Peggy," he said, his eyes big with reproach, "you out alone at this time of night! Where have you been?"

Peggy was silent. Her load of woe seemed really greater than she could bear.

"I asked your mother," Jack went on, looking into her tear-dimmed eyes, "and she told me that you were out every night now, working. Is that true?"

"Jack"—Peggy gulped down a big sob—"how do you think we should live if I didn't work? Do you suppos we have an income or—or—that it—it rains money.

"No, dear," he said, tenderly stroking the smooth little head, and the light of deepest compassion in his eyes—which she couldn't see. "I know you go to work, but I do not believe that you still do the sewing as your mother thinks. Am I right?"

Peggy moved away from him, indignant.

"I refuse to answer," she declared. "You have no right to question me. I am old enough to do as I think best. When I am your wife you can command me, but until then—no."

"Won't you trust me, Peggy?"—very diffidently.

"I cannot—just yet."

Peggy cried bitterly when Jack had gone. Of course, he had the right to question her, but she resented his interference. Then she was afraid of his anger when he learned what she was doing. But men were so inconsiderate, she thought. They would sooner hear of a woman starving than working for her livelihood. If Peggy had applied to Jack he might have helped her, but the independent little lady would have cut out her tongue rather than apply to the young man.

The idea of work next night sickened her. She went to the theatre depressed and ill. Queen of the Gnomes! How utterly silly the term queen sounded applied to herself. She felt she was the most inferior gnome in the gathering. Then the thought of meeting the King face to face again! How horrible it was. Was life always to be as dark and unpleasant as it seemed just now? Peggy donned her black goblin attire with the strongest inclination she had ever felt to tear it to pieces. She was thankful that she had not been called upon to be one of the smiling radiant fairies. She could not have smiled upon this occasion.

The curtain rose upon the dark, subterranean cavern, where the gnomes had their home. Peggy was thinking of Jack all the time. If only she had told him what she was doing! She would have felt more at her ease, at any rate. This weight on the conscience was killing her. She would tell him tomorrow. Further concealment was utterly impossible.

She felt better after she had come to this determination and nerved herself for her work in the second act when she had to meet the King of Gnomes. She had not seen him behind the scenes at all to-night. Usually he was a most determined lounger, although he was not obliged to appear until the second act.

Ah! There he was. As she saw him approaching she turned away in an irrepressible ecstasy of repulsion. He did not attempt to come near her, strange to say. He stood at one wing while she waited at the other. A feeling of gratitude took possession of her. Perhaps he intended to cease his persecutions after all.

In the first eight months of 1888, thirty five woolen mills failed, with liabilities of $2,[illegible]. In the first eight months of the present year forty six woolen mills failed with liabilities of $[illegible]. There were two causes of these failures. Destroyed by Fire.

The large frame dwelling house of Mr. John C. WASHINGTON LETTER.

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Ex-Speaker Carlisle was this evening nominated by the democratic caucus for Speaker of the House. All of the former House officials received the compliment of a renomination. No action was taken by the caucus as to the course of the party in the House, it being thought best to wait until the republican programme was known.

[illegible]

[illegible] against Benjamin F. Butler for $[illegible] damages for slander.

This has been an unusually quiet week in Washington. Probably the lull that always precedes a storm. The storm will begin next Monday when the Fifty first Congress comes together, and will last —goodness only knows how long.

Mr. Blaine entertained the delegates to the International Marine Conference at dinner last Tuesday. The conference expects to get away in two or three weeks, in fact the English delegates have already gone.

Representative Randall hopes to occupy his seat in the House Monday. He also hopes to be able to take as active a part in the legislation of the session as he has always has done. The last hope can hardly be realized, unless Mr. Randall possesses a great deal more strength than his appearance indicates.

Assistant Secretary Bussey, of the department of the Interior takes up the greater portion of his annual report in defending the pension decisions he has made since last March. A judicial decision should always be its own defense, but then perhaps Mr. Bussey doesn't consider his decisions judicial. Anyway there is something about his report that seems out of keeping with good taste and the general fitness of things.

Secretary Tracy may now claim to be even with Secretary Noble for the Tanner dismissal. Last week Mr. Noble made a call on five of the most prominent of the re-rated officials of the Pension office for their resignations. One of them is a protege of Mr. Tracy, to whom he at once went in his trouble. The result of the interview was that the officials refused to resign, and announced their intention of fighting for their places. In the meantime it was whispered around that Mr. Tracy had determined to make this a fight to the death, and that if he failed to keep his man in the Pension office he would leave the cabinet. Just as things had reached this interesting stage the semi-official announcement is made that out of personal consideration for the men concerned, Secretary Noble had decided not to dismiss the officials who refused to resign. Personal [illegible]. He found out that Secretary Tracy's Congressional backing was about ten times heavier than his own and concluded it was better to back down than to get knocked down.

Representative Reed thinks the recent elections have reminded the republicans that minority and republicanism may be synonymous sometime and that they will not attempt to pass a set of rules in the House which will deprive the minority of its parliamentary rights.

Arrangements have been made by the Navy department to secure the new smokeless powder for the small arms in that branch of the service.

Senator Berry says the democrats of the Senate will be able to say what will not be done by that body but they will have to allow their opponents the privilege of deciding what will be done.

The speakership nomination will be settled at the republican caucus to-morrow night, and not before. The field is still energetically working to get up some sort of combination to "down" Reed, but unless they make a good deal more progress in the next twenty four hours than there is now any indication of they have little hopes of success.

Gen. Mahone has come to Washington for the winter. Notwithstanding his defeat he continues to control the Federal patronage of Virginia.

Ex-Attorney General Garland will practice law in this city, while [illegible] his residence in Arkansas.

COMMISSIONER'S SALE
OF VALUABLE REAL ESTATE.

In pursuance of a decree of the Circuit Court of Randolph county, West Virginia, rendered on the 20th day of September, 1889, in the suit in equity of C. Aultman & Co. vs. Jacob S. Wamsley and others, And three other causes, heard therewith, the undersigned, on the 3rd day of January, 1890 at the front door of the Court House of said county, will offer for sale at auction to the highest bidder the following described tracts of land:

30 acres, 30 acres, 300 acres, 110 acres, 135 acres, 800 acres, 190 acres, 7½ acres, 2,000 acres, 182 acres and [illegible] acres owned by Jacob S. Wamsley; so much of the 135 and 110 acre tracts as was not embraced by the convey ance from said Wamsley to Jacob Crouch will be sold; and so much of the 190 acre tract as was not embraced by the deed from said Wamsley to Edgar D. Wamsley will be sold. The two tracts of 30 acres each and the parcels of the 190 acres, the 135 acres and the 110 acres, not conveyed as aforesaid, together with the 7½ acres and the 41 acres compose what is known as the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley and is situate on the Tygarts Valley River in said county. The 300 acres adjoins the said farm and is principally unimproved. The 800 acres is situate in said county on Elk Water. The 2000 acres, the 182 acres and the 36 acres, adjoining each other and are situate on the waters of Greenbrier River in Pocahontas Co. and known as the "Hamilton Place." And the 10 or 12 acres lying on mill creek, Randolph county between lands of L. C. Conrad and S. M. Wamsley and the 30 acres, Andrew Wamsley land, situate on said creek owned by Melvin Currence; And the 113 acres and 107 acres owned by Patrick Crickard, and being the same lands conveyed by him in trust to Leland Kittle; and the [illegible] acres, [illegible] acres and 2 acres owned by Phoebe A. Crickard and being the same lands conveyed to her by James Moyers. The five last named tracts compose what is known as the Patrick Crickard home place, situate in Randolph county on the Tygart's Valley River near Huttonsville. A plat of the lands to be sold composing the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley, as well as the lands of the said Patrick and Phoebe A. Crickard will be made by the County Surveyor and exhibited at the sale. The home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley is largely improved, with barn, two dwelling houses, other out buildings and orchards thereon, partly composed of the finest river bottom, with good uplands and in a fine state of cultivation. Upon the said 300 acre tract there is valuable timber, accessible to the Tygarts Valley River. The 800 acres on Elkwater has on it about 300 acres of fine soil, the richest soil and a good quality of timber. Upon the said "Hamilton Place" there is about [illegible] acres [illegible], about 100 acres of which is in sod and produces the finest blue grass. The residue of the land is very rich soil with limestone, and first class timber, such as cherry, ash, hemlock, &c., the 10 or 12 acres, Currence land is improved and the 30 acres is partially improved and is of rich soil with a very fine orchard of young and well selected fruit trees thereon. The said "Patrick Crickard Home Place" except the 113 acres is principally improved land of the finest river bottom, upon which is a new dwelling house, other out buildings, a good orchard and is in a high state of cultivation. The 113 acres lies on the east side of the Tygarts Valley River, from the improved lands, is good soil, upon which there is the finest timber, such as white oak, poplar, &c. Such an opportunity for the purchase of valuable timber and improved lands at judicial sale is rarely offered in this section, and parties desiring to make investments in this beautiful valley with its prospects of further development by the extension of its railroad facilities, will do well to investigate the properties to be sold.

TERMS OF SALE.

Said lands will be sold for five per cent of the purchase money cash in hand and the residue in equal amounts upon a credit of 6, 12, 18 & 24 months with interest from the day of sale and purchasers to give notes with good security for the deferred payments.

[illegible], Special
[illegible], Commissioners.

I certify that bond and security has been given by the above named Commissioner as required by the decree of sale.

Obituary.

"Alas! how changed that lovely flower
Which bloomed and cheered my heart;
Fair fleeting comfort of an hour,
How soon we're called to part."

One of the most pathetic incidents that has recently come to the writer's notice was the sudden decease of little Minnie Lightner aged five years, youngest child of Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Lightner near Green Bank, Nov. 5th.

This was a bud of rare promise and was idolized by her parents and greatly beloved by all friends and acquaintances of the family. Her mother had taught her to sing portions of the hymn.

"Little ones like me" and the little daughter was often heard repeating them with her sweet voice.

So insidious was her disease that no fears were entertained until a few hours before she closed her eyes in the last sleep, gently hoping away.

Her death having occurred in the absence of her fondly attached father, rendered the affliction still more mournful.

Nevertheless "it is well with the child." Her spirit is gone to be with Jesus, and her little form rests near her loved Grandfather, waiting for the resurrection morn.

"Hope looks beyond the bounds of time
When what we now deplore;
Shall rise in full immortal prime
And bloom to fade no more.

Cease then fond nature, cease thy tears
The savior dwells on high;
There everlasting spring appears,
There joys shall never die."

Huntersville, W. Va.

December 5, 1889.

Five minutes later and she was upon the stage, and the time for the unveiling of the King had arrived. Peggy trembled at the idea of again suffering this wretch's brutal smile, of feeling his hated arms around her waist. Well, she reflected, it could not be helped. She must be patient. After this week she would submit to such indignity no longer.

With an effort she tore from his head the veil, and then recoiled without looking into his face. The dreaded moment was at hand. His arm was around her waist. He was unnecessarily close. It was horrible. It was—

In a frenzy of wrath she looked up, words of burning indignation on her lips. They were never uttered. The color fled from her cheeks; her eyes were rounded with a vast surprise; her breath came and went most alarmingly; she would have fallen but that the King held held her firmly and masterfully in his arms.

And in this King she recognized her own Jack Ruffington.

* * * * * * *

"How did you manage it, Jack?" asked Peggy, excidely, as they were in the street, on their way home.

Jack laughed. "Dearest girl, he said, "did you imagane that you could have done anything for any length of time without my knowing it? A week ago I called at your house and found you out. I made your mother promise not to tell you of my visit. Next night I discovered what you were doing—no matter how. Last night I gave you an opportunity to confide in me. No, you were too self-willed. So I puzzled the thing over, and finally decided upon this scheme. I knew the stage manager of the company, and also the manager. It appears that the fellow who has played the King of the Gnomes left suddenly after last night's performance. They have engaged somebody for Monday. I persuaded them to let me go on to-night."

"Oh, Jack!" exclaimed Peggy. She could say nothing more.

"Well, Miss Leamington."

"Will you ever forgive me, Jack, for my deception. I am vere awful I know; but, but—oh! I had to do it!"

Mr. Ruffington put his hand into his pocket, and pulled out an envelope. From this he extracted something that looked like a check, and presented it to Peggy.

"That," he said, "is a receipt for one month's rent in advance of a lovely little flat in Harlem, beginning from the first of next month. I've been 'raised,' Peggy, and—and"——

"What, Jack, dear?" asked Peggy, innocently.

"Can't you guess?"—bashfully.

"You've been 'raised' you tell me, and you show me the receipt for the rent of a flat. I suppose you are going to live there. That is it, isn't it, Jack?" (All this with the most bewildering unconsciousness.)

"Yes, I'm going to live there, Peggy," said Jack, "with you as my wife, if you will."

Then, although they were in the street, he gave her a tender, unmistakable kiss—a most disgraceful proceeding—she, a willing accomplice, raised not the least objection. Luckily it was very dark and the neighborhood was deserted.

"You haven't given me my answer," said Jack at last.

"Well," declared Miss Leamington, "as you have secured the flat and paid the rent in advance, I don't rally see why you can't take my answer for granted. But for the sake of formality, Jack, I will say yes. I should not like your plans to be spoiled by such a trifle as—as a wife."

A business man and financier of the first rank is so absent minded that he occasionally forgets to go to his lunch. His customary hour for this meal—when he remembers it—is 2 o'clock.

The other day, quite absorbed in business, he worked steadily on until 4 o'clock, and then began to have a quite natural sence of emptiness and yearning in his stomach.

"Dear me," he said, musingly, applying the flat of his hand to his waistcoat, "I wonder what I ate for lunch that disagrees with me."

Snagly—"Got the dead wood on the shoe-black just now, Bogg."

Bogg—"How?"

Snagly—"Rung in a lead quarter on him, and skipped while he went for the change."

Bogg—"Was it that red-headed boy with the big ears?"

Snagly—"Yes."

Bogg—"Thought I saw him trying to put up a job with the boy who struck you for a Times. How much did you give him?"

Snagly—"Why, half a dol—— Great Scott! I've got the same lead quarter back."

Mr. Blunder (visiting studio)——Aha that's awfully good, by Jove. What interesting subject to paint those old tramps are. Such rattling strong color, you know. This one seems to be a regular old soak—got an awful beak on him—regular "terrible example" for a temperance lecturer. Where did you pick him up?

Mr. Brush (the artist)—Oh—a—that—oh—that's a portrait of myself I've been working on lately.

A friend of mine was visiting in the family of a well-known Maine man not long ago. A lovely flaxen-haired child of 6 years, the pet of the family, attempted to open a door, which stuck. She pulled and pulled, but could not move it.

"D——n it!" they were astonished to hear her say, as she gave a supreme tug and the door yielded.

"Why, what do you mean Maud?" exclaimed the horrified mamma.

"That's the way papa opens it," said Maud, innocently.

First Democrat—Talk about the morality of the Republican party! Look at their Vice President! Running a bar in Washington! Second Democrat (better posted)—That turns out to be a mistake. There isn't going to be any bar in the Vice President's building. First Democrat (indignantly)—No bar? Is he going to run one of these dashed temperance hotels?

Three generations back, or more,
two grand pas had a fray;
Their grandsons still are in it just as actively to-day.
First one on this side bites the dust
and then one falls on that.
And year by year they cultivate
the game of "tit for tat."
And while there's one remains on either side the fight's renewed—
Naught but extermination ends an old Kentucky feud.

Bowery Swell to his best girl—O what'll you have to drink? Best Girl—I guess I'll take champagne. Bowery Swell—Goes again.

She—What under the sun makes broken down widowers so anxious to marry again? He—Possibly because they want to get repaired.

"Any fellow that comes along can get the pull on you," said the doorstep to the bell handle. "Not till he has walked over you," was the bell handle's retort.

"I don't feel at all well this morning," complained the Funny Man belonging to one of our daily contemporaries. "Take Bunsby's Blood Burner," replied the Managing Editor, "it's warranted to remove all bad humors.

When men are condemned to be executed, for some time previous to the fatal day they seem to be given to sportiveness. However there is one pastime in which they are not permitted to indulge, and that is skipping the rope.

Lady Visiter—"I'm going now, Tommy; wouldn't you like to walk home with me?"

Tommy—"No, I'm afraid I couldn't keep up."

"Could not keep up! Why child?"

"'Cause I hear folks say you're rather fast."

THE OLD STOVE.

"Nancy!" said Mr. Moppet.

"Sir?" responded Nancy.

Mr. Moppet was coming in from the garden path. Nancy, with plump white arms bared to the elbow, was washing the breakfast dishes in a deep pan of hot soapsuds.

Mr. Moppet was a hard featured elderly man, with whitish blue eyes, a straggly fringe of white beard beneath his square chin, and a bald cranium. Nancy was fresh colored and bright eyed, with silky tendrils of auburn hair drooping over her freckled forehead, and a certain dimple perpetually playing at hide and seek on her left cheek. The two completely realized Shakespeare's ideal of "Crabbed Age and Youth."

"I'm a-goin' to town," said Mr. Mopet. "You won't need to bile no pot victuals for dinner. Waste makes want. A cup o' tea and a biled egg and what's left o' yesterday's pork and greens—that'll be all you need."

"Yes, father, acquiesced Nancy.

She was thinking of something else all the while.

"And, talkin' 'bout eggs," added Mr. Moppet, "you may take four dozen up to Peach Farm. Mrs. Wixon wants plenty on 'em to make cake for her niece's party. Better go early this morning.'"

Nancy colored scarlet under the aburn rings of hair.

"Can't I send 'em up by little Bill Becker, father?" said she. "Webster Wixon will be there, and—and I don't like Webster Wixon, with his red nose and his compliments."

Mr. Moppet frowned.

"Nancy," said he, "don't be a fool. I can see through ye, like ye was a pane o' glass. Webster Wixon's a well-to-do man, with money out at interest, and you'd oughter be tickled to death that he's took a notion to you."

"But, father—"

"Not another word," grumbled Mr. Moppet. "I know jest exactly what's comin.' It's that foolish nonsense about Absalom Parker, that I hoped you'd got over long ago. Absalom hain't no property, and ain't like to have none, and no daughter o'mine ain't goin' to marry your Grandfather Atkin's hired man not if I know it."

He paused with this multiplicity of double negatives. Nancy set her small, pearl white teeth together; her eyes flashed with hazel fire. It was a clear case of true love versus money.

"Take them eggs straight up to Peach Farm," reiterated Mr. Moppet, shaking his forefinger at Nancy, "an' don't argufy the p'int no further. I'm your father, and I know what's best for you!"

"But your going right past the Wixons' door."

"No, I ain't neither. I'm goin' the Horn Hill Road. I've been ap-p'inted by the Supply Committee to buy an airtight wood stove for the church," he added with some complacency. "The old one's rusted clear out, so there's danger o' fire every time its used, and the brethren have subscribed twenty dollars for a new one—leastways, a second hand one, if its just as good."

Webster Wixon, a fat, middle-aged bachelor, was out helping to gather the October apples on the north side of the house when Nancy came up. He made haste to welcome her.

"Good mornin', Miss Nancy," said he. "As bloomin' as ever, I see."

"Here's your eggs," spoke Nancy, curtly.

"Sit down a spell, won't ye" simered Mr. Wixon.

"I'm in a hury," said Nancy.

"But, Nancy——"

"My name is Miss Moppet sir!"

"I've got something very particular to say to you, Nancy," urged the middle aged suitor.

"It'l have to keep," said Nancy. "I've got to get right home."

"Can't I walk with you a piece?"

"I'd rather go alone," she persisted.

"Nancy—Miss Moppet—I must speak!" blurted out the old bachelor. "I love you better'n all the world! I want to make you Mrs. Webster Wixon! There, that's what I had on my mind! And your good father, he says it would suit him exactly, and——"

Nancy wheeled around and faced her eager swain.

"Is it me, or father, you're a-courting?" said she.

"Why you, of course!"

"Then take my answer—No!"

And without waiting for the return of her basket, she hurried away, her cheeks blazing, her breath coming quick and fast.

"Father'll be awful mad," she thought, "but I'd sooner die than marry that man!"

Webster Wixon stood a minute gazing after her in crestfallen silence; then he went back to apple harvesting with an ominous compression of his lips.

"The madder she gets the prettier she looks," thought he. "Well, well, time will show. Brother Moppet says she shall be my wife, and that ought to count for considerable."

Mr. Moppet drove leisurely on to Horn Hill, drove an excellent bargain for a highly ornamental wood-stove, after having successively interviewed every hardware dealer in town, and set forth to return with it in his wagon just at dusk.

"It's a warm day for the time o' year," said he, "and it's easier traveling for the horse arter dark. It ain't a bad day's work, come to think on't, I beat Brother Piper down pretty well on the price, and it's worth a dollar'n half to cart the thing home over these bumpy roads. They 'lowed twenty dollars for it, and I got it for fifteen. Takin' my time and wheel wear and horseflesh into consideration, I guess I won't say nothin' about the odd five dollars. Business is business. It's a proper pretty pattern, too—thistle leaves and acorns. I'd like one the same fashion in my best room, and"—"why shouldn't I have it? There's that second handed stove Gran'ther Atkins took for a debt from Solon Grubb. It's jest standin' rustin' away in his back wood shed. I'll fetch it home tomorrow and black it up, and let Elder Meachan suppose I got a bargain from somebody; and I'll have the nice new stove for myself, and nobody'll be none the wiser, now that Gran'ther Atkins is confined to his bed with creepin' paralysis and Absalom Parker's up in the wood lots, choppin' down trees for winter firewood. It's a good idee. I'm glad I happened to think of it!"

He drew rein opposite the Atkins house. All was dark and quiet there save the one red light that burned in old Mr. Atkin's bedroom.

At that identical moment, had he but know it, Absalom Parker—the old man's general factotum—was hanging over the garden gate of his own place, talking to pretty Nancy among the purple dahlias and quilled asters.

And it was no difficult task for a man of John Moppet strength skillfully to lift the old stove out of its place in the outer shed into his wagon.

"Git up, Prince," he muttered to his horse, shaking the reins, and away they went.

Elder Meachan was not quite satisfied with the bargain. The church brethren, too, would have preferred a new stove, considering the money they had spent; but Brother Moppet was a man in authority, and they were compelled to acquiesce in his choice.

Nancy was delighted with the new acquisition for the best room.

"Oh, isn't it pretty!" said she.

"Yes," nodded Mr. Moppet, rubbing his hands, "it'll sort o' dress up the room for your weddin'."

"My wedding?"

"Jest so. I've arranged matters with Webster Wixon, and——"

Nancy burst into tears, and ran out of the room.

Mr. Moppet glared balefully after her.

"She shall marry him," muttered he, "or she shall be no darter o' mine! I won't be set at defiance by—— Why, hellos, Absalom Parker, what brings you here?"

"Mr. Atkins is took wuss this afternoon," said Absalom, standing at the doorway, like a rustic Apollo "Wants to see ye—right off!"

It was a Saturday afternoon. As Mr. Moppet drove by the church door, he saw the load of wood being delivered for the first fire of the season.

"Jest in time!" said he to himself. "There's a frosty feel in the air."

Grandfather Atkins lay among his pillows, like a wrinkled ghost.

"John," said he, "all I've got in the world is yours; but I think I'd ought to tell you where I've hid it, sence the bank robbery give me such a scare."

"Certainly, certainly!" said his son-in-law, with eager eyes, like those of a bird of prey.

"I've hid it away——"

John Moppet placed his ear close to the pallid lips.

"Six five-hundred-dollar bills——"

"Yes, yes—go on!"

"Folded up in an old number of the Horn Hill Gazette——"

"An old number of the Horn Hill Gazette—I understand!" repeated Moppet.

"In the old stove out in the shed!" gasped the old man. "I knowed nobody wouldn't be likely to look there. It's yours, Jno. Moppet—every cent of it. And mind you, don't spend it in no extravagance!"

So speaking, the old miser closed his dim eyes and went where there is neither money nor counting of money.

John Moppet uttered an exceeding bitter cry as he remembered the lighted match he had put to the crumpled papers in the stove, to make sure of a draught when it was put up in the northwest corner of the church—the roar of the blaze through the lengths of Russian pipe. In his excellent management he had contrived to overreach himself.

He went home and sat all the evening in a sort of stupor, with his head in his hands.

Nancy busied about her household tasks, watched him with hazel eyes of surprise.

"I didn't know he thought so much of Gran'ther Atkins," pondered she.

"Six times five is thirty—six times five is thirty," mused Mr. Moppet, rocking to and fro. "Six five-hundred dollar bills! Three—thousand—dollars—and all gone up chimbly in one breath o' wind and me as done it! I shall go crazy. I shall lose my mind. Three—thou—sand—dollars! It's a judgment on me. I've been a miserable sinner, and cheated the church. I've tampered with my own conscience. Six five hundred dollar bills! Oh, Lord, there ain't no calculatin' what a mis'able sinner I've been!"

As the old kitchen clock struck nine, Absalom Parker came in, bringing with him a gust of fresh, frosty air.

"Evenin' Squire," said he. "I'm sort o' looking up the watchers. Spose you'd like to be one of 'em? But I'd like to speak a word to you first."

"If it's about Nancy, it ain't no use, said Mr. Moppett, rousing himself to the affairs of the world with some petulance.

"It ain't about Nancy," Absalom answered, with a smile. "It's about Mr. Atkin's money."

Mr. Moppet gave a start.

"Oh, you needn't jump so," reassured Absalom. "It's all safe."

He took a flat parcel out of his pocket.

"Count 'em," said he. "Six, ain't there?"

Mr. Moppet stared at Absalom Parker as Aladdin might have started at the Genii.

"How—where—" he stammered.

Absalom gave a low chuckle.

"Hush!" said he. "Don't speak loud. I seen the old man hide 'em there, like a human magpie as he was. I knowed it wasn't safe, so I quietly took 'em out, arter he'd had that last stroke, and locked 'em in his black leather trunk up in the garret. And you may thank me that they wasn't all burned up in the first fire you lighted in that identical stove!"

Mr. Moppet turned a purplish red.

"You know about that stove?" said he, with a gasp.

"It wasn't likely no such conjuring would go on about Mr. Atkins place, and me not know it," said Parker, drily. "The stove wasn't of no great consequence, though, except for old iron. I guess the church folks 'll get sick of it before a great while."

Mr. Moppet drew a long breath.

"When they do," said he, "I'll mak 'em a present of a brand-new one. And, Absalom—"

"Yes, Mr. Moppet?"

"You won't say nothin' to nobody?"

"No," said Absalom, "I ain't one o' the talkin' sort."

"And, Absalom—"

"Yes, Mr. Moppet?"

"Since you and Nancy really are attached to each other—"

"We're just that, Mr. Moppet."

"I don't see no objection to your gettin' married this fall," said Moppet, with an effort. "You may tell Nancy that she has my consent!"

Nancy cried a shower of happy tears when Absalom told her the good news.

But he never imparted to her the story of the stove. As he himself had remarked, "he was not one of the talkin' sort."

Huntersville, W. Va.

December 12, 1889.

A young brakeman was knocked off a train and killed while passing through a bridge near Moundsville the other day.

A man in Wheeling the other day deliberately crawled under a moving train.—It is scarcely necessary to say that he died.

The editor of a newspaper in Germany is on trial in that country for stating that Emperor William rode in a second class cab.

Chas. W. Tabler a young man was arrested a few days ago in Taylor Co., charged with the brutal and mysterious murder of Jacob Morgan about 18 months ago on Bushy run that Co.

Judge Thomas C. Greene, of the West Virginia Supreme Court, died at his home in Charleston the 4th inst., at the age of 78. He had been on the bench since 1875, and was regarded as one of the ablest jurists of the country.

Cyrus Fillmore, brother of him once President, died at his home near Lagrange, Ind., Monday, of typhoid fever, at the age of 87. His wife, aged 85, is dangerously sick. A son of the ex President died a short time ago at Buffalo.

Some negroes in Wheeling a few days ago while in a barber shop thought they would have some fun out of a sleeping negro by pouring a pint of Alcohol over him and lighting it, which resulted in burning him very seriously and may die. They have been arrested and their practical joke may land them in the penitentiary.

One of the keepers in the Raymond Street, New York, Jail made a canvas of the prisoners to ascertain how their opinions stood as to the guilt for innocence of John Greenwald, condemned to die for murder, and whom Governer Hill refused to reprieve. All but two of the 348 voted him innocent. The inquiry was not so absurd as it seems, as it shows how crime sympathies with crime and can always be expected to protect it when that is possible.

WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, December, 9.—Senator Vance is in dead earnest in his fight on the humbug civil service law. He thinks it ought to go and he has the courage of his convictions; hence he has introduced a bill in the senate providing for its repeal, and he says it is his purpose to force a vote upon it if possible during the session. If there is anything done in this matter it is more probable that it will be accomplished by failing to make the necessary appropriation for the support of the commission than by a direct repeal of the law, though the latter course would be much more manly.

The non-action of the democratic House caucus leaves ex-Speaker Carlisle in full charge of the party's interests on the floor of the house. No better or abler leader could be found, and experience will soon show that it is far better to have one man in control than a committee of fifteen, as was at first proposed.

It argues well for future democratic success in the House that one of the republican caucus nominations—Rev. C. B. Ramsdell for Chaplain—was defeated at the organization of that body, and the old Chaplain, Dr. Milburn re elected.

Speaker Reed is having a high old time trying to satisfy the wants of his republican colleagues in the matter of committee chairmanships. It is extremely doubtful whether the committees will be announced before the Christmas recess.

Mr. Harrison has gone to Chicago, and it is stated at the White House that he will go to Indianapolis before returning home.

David J. Brewer, of Kansas, has been nominated to be associate Justice of the Supreme Court. He has been United States Judge, of the eighth Kansas circuit since 1884. Little is known of him here further than the fact that he is a nephew of Justice Stephen J. Field. The republicans do not fancy the appointment much, but there is no open opposition, and Mr. Brewer will probably be confirmed by the Senate.

Eight columns of solid nonpareil without a single original idea. That's the feat accomplished by President Harrison in writing his annual message to Congress, and the manner of presentation is equally as hackneyed as the ideas presented. Never, during an experience in Washington covering the administrations of five Presidents, has your correspondent seen a Presidential message fall as flat as this one has. The message will make Mr. Harrison no friends, and with the exception of the absurd paragraph relating to politics in the South, will make him no enemies. Mr. Blaine's worst enemy will not accuse him of having had any hand in the preparation of this message, for whatever else Mr. Blaine may be, he is always original and brilliant. More republicans than ever, now refer to Mr. Harrison as Hayes.

The House adjourned from Tuesday to Thursday.

Three Federal election bills have already been introduced in the Senate, two by Mr. Spooner and one by Mr. Sherman. Mr. Chandler's bill applying only to some of the Southern States will also shortly be introduced in the House. All of which is a useless waste of time on the part of these gentlemen, for if there are any one thing upon which the democrats of the House are thoroughly agreed, it is that no Federal election Bill shall go through the House.

Mr. Randall has not yet been able to resume his seat in the House. He thinks he is well enough to do so but his physician positively forbids it.

The District bill, which caused the great dead lock in the last House, has been again introduced in the Senate. The bill is certain to pass Senate, but owing to the large number of new members in the House its fate there is not so certain, although the probabilities are all in favor of its passage.

The national wool growers association has been in session here this week. Its members feel somewhat alarmed at the outlook. They fear that the demand for free wool that is constantly being made by eastern manufacturers will at least have its effect upon Congress. They are afraid of Reed, who is believed to squint towards free wool, and will not feel relieved until the republican members of the House committee on Ways and Means are announced. They are at present doing their level best to have a hand in naming them.

COMMISSIONER'S SALE

OF VALUABLE REAL ESTATE.

In pursuance of a decree of the Circuit Court of Randolph county, West Virginia, rendered on the 28th day of September, 1889, in the suit in equity of C. Aultman & Co. vs, Jacob S. Wamsley and others, And three other causes, heard therewith, the undersigned, on the 3rd day of January, 1890 at the front door of the Court House of said county, will offer for sale at auction to the highest bidder the following described tracts of land:

50 acres, 50 acres, 500 acres, 110 acres, 125 acres, 808 acres, 180 acres, 7½ acres, 2,000 acres, 132 acres and 20 acres owned by Jacob S. Wamsley; so much of the 125 and 110 acre tracts as was not embraced by the conveyance from said Wamsley to Jacob Crouch will be sold; and so much of the 180 acre tract as was not embraced by the deed from said Wamsley to Edgor D. Wamsley will be sold. The two tracts of 50 acres each and the parcels of the 180 acres, the 125 acres and the 110 acres, not conveyed as aforesaid, together with the 7½ acres and the 41 acres compose what is known as the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley and is situate on the Tygarts Valley River in said county. The 500 acres adjoins the said farm and is principally unimproved: The 808 acres is situate in said county on Elk Water. The 2000 acres, the 132 acres and the 20 acres, adjoining each other and are situate on the waters of Greenbrier River in Pocahontas Co. and known as the "Hamilton Place;" And the 10 or 12 acres lying on mill creek, Randolph county between lands of L. C. Conrad and S. M. Wamsley and the 50 acres, Andrew Wamsley land, situate on said creek owned by Melvin Currence; And the 113 acres and 107 acres owned by Patrick Crickard, and being the same lands conveyed by him in trust to Leland Kittle; and the 94 acres, 34 acres and 2 acres owned by Phoebe A Crickard and being the same lands conveyed to her by James Moyers. The five last named tracts compose what is known as the Patrick Crickard home place, situate in Randolph county on the Tygart's Valley River near Huttonsville. A plat of the lands to be sold composing the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley, as well as the lands of the said Patrick and Phoebe A. Crickard will be made by the County Surveyor and exhibited at the sale. The home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley is largely improved, with barn, two dwelling houses, other out buildings and orchards thereon, party composed of the finest river bottoms, with good uplands and in a fine state of cultivation. Upon the said 500 acre tract there is valuable timber, accessible to the Tygarts Valley River. The 808 acres on Elkwater has on it about 300 acres of fine soil, the richest soil and a good quality of timber. Upon the said "Hamilton Place" there is about 800 acres haceed, about 100 acres of which is in sod and produces the finest blue grass. The residue of the land is very rich soil with limestone and first class timber, such as cherry, ash, hemlock, &c., the 10 or 12 acres, Currence land is improved and the 50 acres is partially improved and is of rich soil with a very fine orchard of young and well selected fruit trees thereon. The said "Patrick Crickard Home Place" except the 113 acres is principally improved land of the finest river bottom, upon which is a new dwelling house, other out buildings, a good orchard and is in a high state of cultication. The 113 acres lies on the east side of the Tygarts Valley River, from the improved lands, is good soil, upon which there is the finest timber, such as white oak, poplar, &c. Such an opportunity for the purchase of valuable timber and improved lands at judicial sale is rarely offered in this section, and parties desiring to make investments in this beautiful valley with its prospects of further development by the extension of its railroad facilities, will do well to investigate the properties to be sold.

TERMS OF SALE.

Said lands will be sold for five per cent of the purchase money cash in hand and the residue in equal amounts upon a credit of 6, 12, 24 & 36 months with interest from the day of sale and purchases to give notes with good security for the deferred payments.

HOME NEWS.

—The President's message is long tiresome, tedious and tasteless.

—C. P. Dorr, of Addison, was in the city Tuesday.

—Look out for Xmas it will be here just in two weeks.

—J. C. Loury Jr., started for Washington City, this morning (Wednesday).

—The Post Office at Aylmer has been ordered discontinued, to take effect Dec. 31st.

—Messrs. K. O. Wade and John Waugh, of Academy, called to see us Tuesday.

—Quite a number of gentlemen attended the sale at this place Tuesday.

—W. R. Tyree, of the firm of Tyree & Rollins was in town last week.

—Mr. J. R. Poage, Sr., of Edray, is visiting his daughter Mrs. A. Barlow, at this place.

—Rev. Jas. E. Moore and wife, of Mill Point, were in attendance at preaching Sunday.

—THE TIMES job office has had a big run of job printing for some days past, among which was work from Virginia towns.

—We printed for Atty. H. S. Rucker this week a brief for the Court of Appeals in the case of Auldridge vs. McNeel, Beard, &c.

—We would like to have President Harrison in our town to write legal ads. for our paper, for we get 2½ cts a word for such, and we believe he can talk more and say nothing than any man in the United States.

—We have recv'd a letter from Mr. W. T. Perry, who moved from Beaver creek, a few weeks ago, to Waxihachie, Texas, and he says they are very well pleased with the country and thinks he has made a good move.

—While Jas. Harr's (Col.) and his wife living about two miles from this place, were away from home Monday night their house was broken into and about 163 lbs., of beef stolen.

PAULINA.

Death of Jefferson Davis.

Jefferson Davis closed his eyes in death at fifteen minutes before 1 o'clock on the morning of the 6th surrounded by friends and relatives who were within call.

He was a man of great bearing and of great integrity and purity; and many a statesman of to-day will go down to his grave that will not be missed so much as Mr. Davis; and the south for generations to come will mourn the death of this noble man, and well they might for they mourn for one who represented more than any other the cause for which a million of her most chivalrous sons drew their swords and joined battle with the most formidable of adversaries, their own countrymen, for rights and liberties that freemen must ever hold most dear.

Of the might captains and great statesmen he gathered around him when he presided over the destinies of the South, but few survive. They passed away before him, as did the rulers and nearly all the great soldiers of the cause that he confronted so boldly and opposed so stoutly, Lincoln, Grant and McClellan. He has outlived his great, and noble adversaries. He saw them pass away, mourned by by a nation and worthily wearing its honors, secure in the love of the people, to whom he was faithful to the end.

Gone to be with the Redeemer

The 26th of August, 1889, brought very sad hours to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Amos P. McGlaughlin, near Huntersville.

It was then there daughter Mary Minnie aged four years and two months departed this life.

On one Sabbath she becomes seriously ill, the day following, hearing a young Christian Lady singing a hymn accompanied by an organ, she looked upward and asked her mother would there be organs in heaven.

Mamma I love to hear you sing
"Though the dark waves roll high,
we will be undismayed
Let us pass over the river and rest
under the shade of the trees."

She always had a verse to repeat to her sabbath school teacher; her last golden text was: "Fear God and keep his commandments."

For more than a year she never closed her eyes at night without repeating her evening prayer.

"The bird like voice, whose joyous tone,
Make glad this scene of sin and strife,
Sings now her everlasting song
Amid the tree of Life.

And when He sees a smile too bright,
Or heart too pure for taint of vice,
He bears it to that world of light
To dwell in Paradise."

MR. AND MRS. BOWSER.

The other night I was taken with a sort of a pleurisy pain, and I nudged Mr. Bowser and asked him to get up and mix me a mustard plaster. He lay on the broad of his back, hands locked under his neck, and was snoring as if he was hired to give a midnight performance on a fog-horn.

"Eh! Yes," he growled as I nudged him.

"Mr. Bowser, get up."

"Yum! Lemme 'lone."

Mr. Bowser, I am in great pain."

"Yes, I know."

"Will you get up?"

"Whaz the mazzer now?" he demanded as he tried to sit up in the bed.

"I am threatened with pleurisy."

"Hey! Who is it?"

"I am threatened with pleurisy, and I do wish you would get up and mix a mustard plaster for me."

"Josh!" he growled now fully awake. "You just lie quiet and the pain will go away.

He dropped back and began to snore again, but after 10 minutes' hard work I got him out of bed. He sat on the edge, staring blankly into vacancy, and ready to fall back at any moment, and even while I was telling him that I might not live till morning he fell over, kicked himself under the clothes, and went to sleep while I was pulling his hair.

A night or two later, just after the bells had struck 12, I dreamed that I was being chased by a locomotive. It gave an extra toot and awoke me. I discovered that toot to be Mr. Bowser's voice groaning.

"For land's sake get up, or I shall be a dead man."

"What is it?"

"Terrible cramps in my stomach. I'm just tied in a knot."

"Oh, it's only a passing pain," I replied as I sought my pillow again. "Lie still and it will soon go off."

"Lie still thunder!" he yelled, as he got one leg out of bed. "I tell you I shall be a corpse within an hour if I don't get relief!"

"Well, you'll find the Jamaica ginger on the sideboard. Take a big dose of it in wine.

"I'll never find it! Oh! Heavens, what a pain!"

I wanted to get up, of course, but I was determined to pay him back in his own coin. I therefore apparently fell asleep, and after banging around the room for a few minutes, he went out. He was back again in three minutes, however, to exclaim:

"Are you going to lay there and let me die like a sick horse?"

"But you didn't get up for me."

"I know it, that was because I—I—whoop! Blue blazes, but I know I'm dying.

I had to get up, of course, and, of course, I had him relieved in a quarter of an hour. Man-like, he was frightened to death at a pain which he would have expected me to keep perfectly still about.

Mr. Bowser is also like all other husbands in another matter. We got started for the theatre, the other night, and I discovered that I had forgotten my opera glasses. He offered to run back for them and I said:

"They are hanging in the bag by the gas jet on the left hand side of our dresser. You can't fail to find them."

Five minutes slipped away—then 10—then I hurried back myself. He was seated in a chair in the hall, hat and overcoat off, and as I opened the door he growled:

"Might as well take of your things."

"But why?"

"We are not going to any theatre this night."

"Not going! Has anything happened?"

"I should say there had! I've looked this infernal house from top to bottom for those glasses, and they are not to be found. We'll put in our evening trying to discover whether they are in the garret or down in the vegetable cellar."

"Mr. Bowser, I told you where those glasses were."

"They are not within 40 rods of it!"

"Come up stairs."

"No use. If there even in your room I'll buy you five million silk dresses."

"Come on."

He followed after, and there hung the bag just where I told him he he would find it. I looked from one to the other, and Mr. Bowser finally said:

"I see how it is. You'll probably say you told me to look here, instead of in the spare bed-room dresser! Take off your things, Mrs. Bowser—we don't stir a foot outside to-night."

One night when baby was sick I got Mr. Bowser out of bed to get the paragoric. After a great deal of yawning and growling he marched off down stairs, and for the fifth time I told him:

"I remembered to have placed it on that bracket over the lounge."

I heard him threshing around and knocking about in the sitting room, rummaging in the pantry and upsetting chairs in the kitchen, and after about 10 minutes appeared at the bottom of the stairs and shouted:

"I've looked the consarned house all over and can't find it."

"I told you it was on the bracket."

"I know you did, but it isn't there!"

"Sure you have looked?"

"Do you take me for an idiot?"

"Well, I'll come down."

I went down, walked him to the bracket and there sat the bottle before his eyes.

"But it wasn't there a minute ago," he protested. "I looked the bracket over at least five times, and I know I'm not blind. Mrs. Bowser, there are some queer happenings in this house. I think it best that we sit down and have some straight talk."

One day at noon he wanted me to tighten a button on his overcoat and I sent him up to my room for a box of thread and needles.

"You'll find it on the sill of the bay window, where I left it half an hour ago," I cautioned, as he went up stairs.

I heard him prancing and slamming things about, and after seven or eight minutes I went up to ascertain the cause of delay.

He had pulled every bureau drawer out, taken down most of the garments in the clothes press, and was then overhauling my jewelry case.

"I'd like to know if there's another woman like you in Detroit!" he exclaimed as I appeared.

"You came up here for the thread box, didn't you?"

"Of course I did."

"And I told you it was on the sill of the bay window."

"But it——"

I pointed it out to him, and after changing countenance and swallowing a lump he braced up and said:

"Mrs. Bowser it is time to quit this tomfoolery! You are too old for such girlish tricks. Next time you try to make a fool of me, I'll ask you to select such furniture as you want and settle on the amount of alimony!"

As He Was Saying.

A man led a raw-boned, humble-faced mule down Clifford street, yesterday morning, turned into Griswold, and finally disappeared inside a blacksmith shop.

"Shoes?" queried the stalwart smith.

"Yes."

"Hind?"

"Yes."

"As I was a-saying when you came in——"

Here he picked up one of the mule's legs and was sent half way across the shop by a twist of the animal's hip. He returned to the attack with unruffled calmness, saying:

"As I was a-saying when you'n the mule came in——"

This time he gets a hind foot in the ribs and was almost knocked over his anvil. He braced up, opened his eyes a little wider, and making another grab for the same foot he repeated:

"As I was a-saying when the mule and you hove——"

This time he got both feet in quick succession, and was driven to the wall ten feet away.

"What is it you are trying to tell me?" asked the owner of the mule.

"Why, I was a-saying as you turned the corner that if you brought that infernal brute to this shop I'd break his back with a crowbar, and now you get him out or I'll do it!"

AN EARTHQUAKE CURE.

As she stood there in the window, with her pretty hands clasped behind her, the soft September sun throwing a golden ray on her bright hair, she was thinking and calling herself all manner of epithets, of which "insane" was, perhaps, the mildest. And yet looking at Sophy Schuyler's arch, lovelay face, you would have thought him a fortunate man who could call that wistful troubled smile into the gray eyes which filled their liquid depths just then.

"It's all in a tangle," thought Sophy; which, being translated, meant that she was partly engaged to one man, and awaking to the consciousness that she was growing rather to deeply interested in another.

Vaughan Hesketh, the unlucky man to whom she fancied she owed allegiance, was an artist, and poor, while Owen Nugent was a wealthy bachelor whom half the girls in town were crazy about.

Sophy was an orphan, perilously pretty, and destined to be the heiress of a very rich old grandfather. Aunt Cynthia, grandpa's sister, abetted her wilful little niece in half her naughtiness.

Aunt Cynthia and Sophy had come up to Catskill quite early in the season, and among the guests at the boarding house where they were located was this artist. Hesketh was very handsome; had fascinating manners and great, mournful eyes, with a poetical way of expressing himself that did him good service; and finding this young, fresh girl (with an aroma of grandpa Schuyler's fortune about her), picturesque and pretty enough for a "study," he proceeded to study her in another way, and played the role of a man wearied, misappreciated and lonely—wouldn't she just try to comfort and console him a little, poor fellow?

Nugent was not near as handsome a man as Hesketh; but there was something better than mere beauty in the broad, white forehead and the frank, blue eyes that met yours so clearly; and his physique was certainly superb. He towered half a head above most of the other gentlemen in the house and, like most very large, powerful men, his manner toward women was peculiarly gentle and deferential.

Sophy would have gone on some time longer, probably in a vague state of discontent and uneasiness scolding herself because Vaughan's society did not give her unalloyed pleasure, if Ida Cochran had not come to Catskill, in all her radiant, successful beauty fresh from a score of triumphs at Newport.

Miss Cochran was a belle of several years' standing, and understood herself, as the prase goes, thoroughly; that is, she had accidentally heard of Owen Nugent's return from Europe and his presence at Catskill—and nothing but mountain air would content the beauty after that intelligence. So her obedient mamma gave a mild assent to the plan; and Ida, conscious beauty as she was, had never looked handsomer than when she walked out on the piazza the evening of her arrival and renewed her acquaintance with Nugent, as he was walking up and down with Sophy's hand on his arm.

For two weeks past Ida had posed, smiled and ogled for the golden prize, while Nugent seemed provokingly unconscious of the entire proceeding. To be sure, he was with her half the time (it would have been a difficult matter to avoid her without undue rudeness), and Sophy missed his little attentions and wondered why it gave her an odd twinge of something she had never felt before when she saw him playing chess with the beauty every evening. And to night, as she sat in the window, she was speculating whether Vaughan would engross her all the time upon the trip which they were expecting to take up the mountain next day.

The mountain party assembled early the next morning, but they did not get off without several secret heartburnings. Heskete, very much to his annoyance, found that he was, as it were, obliged to go in Aunt Cynthia's wagon; and that much enduring lady was separated from Sophy and compelled to matronize Ida and Annot Osborne, a very tall, sallow young woman, whose rather too easy manners were forgiven because of her papa's millions down in Wall street. And Sophy being, unhappily, wedged in between Mrs. Cochran and a priggish chap named Clay, became more resigned to her situation when Owen Nugent climbed up by the driver, directly behind her.

Hesketh was a good deal piqued with Sophy for her innocent gayety on the way up. Every time her blithe, girlish laugh echoed down the path, he chose to feel personally aggrieved because she could be merry when any one but himself was beside her; and therefore, when she lingered a little, and looked rather wistfully up at him as they started forth from the hotel, he pretended not to see the glance, but went on flirting with Annot Osborne.

Annot admired the handsome artist, and was privately exulting at drawing him away from Sophy—so the pair pursued their ramble very contentedly. And, somehow, Sophy dropped behind, and Mr. Clay was more of a prig than ever, she thought, when she saw Ida's blue feather disappear in the distance, with Nugent in attendance.

The party got separated, of course, and Sophy artfully contrived to send Mr. Clay back with a message to Aunt Cynthia, and then she strayed on alone, and very narrowly escaped coming to serious grief. She was going along the edge of a lovely little ravine, pausing now and then to admire its beauty, when suddenly somebody said, just behind her:

"A penny for your thoughts, Miss Sophy."

The voice startled her, she stepped on a round pebble, which turned treacherously under her foot; she felt herself falling—gave a gasping cry—and then oblivion!

A warm hand clasped hers as she trembled back into consciousness.

"My dear child!" Owen Nugent's voice was a trifle unsteady. "Are you hurt by my terrible carelessness?" Sophy essayed to stand upright!

"I believe, I felt a little faint," she, the color rushing back to the pale face as she realized against whose shoulder she leaned. "How shall we ever get up, Mr. Nugent?" He smiled. She had fortunately escaped the rocks and landed on a little green ledge, [illegible]; they were about midway, and the ascent was not very great.

"I think I could carry you up," he said, quite gravely. "You are not a very great weight, you know." She laughed.

"No; but I think I will try to climb it with your assistance," and she put her hand in his with a child's simplicity. They were fully ten minutes climbing however, for Nugent would not let her go fast and watched her steps with such solicitude that her varying color came and went more fitfully than ever. By and by they reached the top.

"I don't know what I should have done without you," Sophy said, with a shy, happy glance utterly upset his discretion. "I wish I could thank you properly."

"Do not be said softly; then, quite abruptly: "Will you solve a problem that I have been asking myself all morning? Do you think in time I could make you love me?"

Every particle of color died out of the lovely face. "Mr. Nugent!" and she burst into tears.

"My dear child! have I frightened you?" he asked, a pained look crossing his face.

"No! yes!" she answered, vaguely, terrified because of a guilty throb of joy in her heart, which she instinctively felt ought not to be there. "Oh! you don't understand! What would Vaughan say?"

"Have you given him a right to say anything?" Nugent's tone was sterner.

"I—at least he would think he had," she faltered out, feeling utterly wretched.

"My dear!" he touched the little cold hand with his lips. "Do not look so troubled. I must not lose your friendship"—— He broke off abruptly. There stood Hesketh and Ida.

"Truants! We have had such a hunt for you!" cried the beauty, with an angry sparkle of her eyes. Hesketh slipped Sophy's hand within his own.

"How dared that man kiss your hand?" he said, in a wrathful undertone, as they followed the others.

"Vaughan!"

"Oh, my love! do not you desert me! I have no one left in the wide world to care for me if you do."

And Sophy felt miserable guilty, and descend into the valley of humiliation, and Vaughan talked desperate stuff and persuaded her (and himself very nearly) that she was his sole hope of redemption, while his thoughts, carrying on the double train that they often do, were busy speculating whether Sophy Schuyler, with her pretty face and prospective fortune, was as rich a prize as sallow Annot Osborne, with half a million already her own. And for the rest of the day his mind ran upon a certain old proverb, which demonstrates the superiority of a bird in the hand, with curious pertinacity.

The weather for some days had been conducive to the dire bewilderment of all weather prophets. Such stifling hot mornings for October and torrents of rain at nightfall, with mists and damps at all hours of the day. Therefore, when Sunday morning dawned without an actual storm, people congratulated themselves as declared their intention of going to church, and being pious, regardless of the dull, heavy air.

Sophy was late and when she came down at last she hurried Hesketh off down the hill and got into church after service had begun. The little edifice was very full, and she walked hesitatingly up the aisle, feeling grateful when Nugent's hand quietly opened a pew door next his own for them, and she sank down into a corner farthest away from Hesketh.

Ida's blue feather nodding in front of her, beside Nugent's broad shoulder, distracted her attention for awhile; but when the choir joined in a hymn, solemn and subdued as the music was, Sophy's head dropped forward between her hands and she began to weep softly.

Sitting there, she realized with a sudden flash of self understanding that she could not, must not, marry this man, who had so bewitched her girlish senses. Could she ever stand in a holy place like this and give him the most solemn vows that can be spoken? Sophy shivered and grew faint at the bare thought. No, she would not bear it another day; she would tell Hesketh tonight, and then, if he wasn't generous enough to release her, she would confess the whole matter to grandpa; his wrath was better than the burden of a secret engagement to a man whom she was beginning to realize she did not love.

Suddenly the church seemed to grow darker; the gaslights on the altar quivered; the ground beneath her shook violently, and the walls seemed to totter at their very foundation. The music ended in a prolonged shriek; people sprang to their feet; women screamed and fainted; and everybody rushed into the aisles, crowding and crushing each other in their panic.

Had the end of the world come? What was about to happen? Sophy's soul rushed to her lips in one agonized shriek.

"Owen! Owen! Where are you? Oh, come!"

Hesketh, with the frantic terror which seizes men in an unknown danger, was far in advance of the strugling crowd in the aisles; but Sophy's light form was lifted from the seat, and a voice said tenderly:

"My own darling! it is a slight earthquake—trust me!"

Sophy closed her eyes; in all her terror for one hot throb of joy thrilled her as no joy had ever done before. If they perished, they would die together. The air blowing on her face and a gust of rain drops revived her; she opened her soft eyes.

"Owen, before we die, just let me tell you——"

"What, love?" for Sophy hardly knew what she was saying.

"That I am—Oh! do you love me so very much?"

He set her down out of his arms, and right there in the village street he kissed her till the lovely face was rosy.

Hesketh married Annot Osborne, and had the supreme satisfaction of sending his wedding cards to Sophy and grandpa Schuyler. How angry he would have been if he could have seen the lovely, unclouded face that bent over grandpa's shoulder as he opened the envelop, and the laughing, half-deprecating voice that said to Nugent:

"What a little goose I was last summer! Oh, Owen! to think that I had to be cured by an earthquake!"

But Sophy's husband closed her lips with a kiss, that said he, at least, was fully satisfied with an earthquake's results.

"And what answer do you make to my appeal?" he asked, as he knelt at her feet.

"James I will be frank with you," she murmured.

"Oh, speak!" he implored, "and relieve me from this agony of suspense."

"Then let me say it cannot be."

"Why not? Oh! why not?"

"Because, James, I do not feel able to support a husband."

Huntersville, W. Va.

December 19, 1889.

One hundred thousand persons viewed the remains of Hon. Jefferson Davis as he lay in state in New Orleans.

Hitherto Goff has claimed that he would be Governor of West Virginia. Now he says that the Democrats will "count him out."

MR. HARRISON, in his message, insists on civil service reform. He has himself inaugurated it by appointing a negress as postmistress in Louisiana.

Robert Browning, the English poet died peacefully at Venice at 10 o'clock on the 12th. He was born in 1812, and in 1846 married Elizabeth Barrett, herself a poet, and to her genius almost as much as to his own, he owed his wide reputation.

Another heavy-weight colored pugilist has loomed up at Viselia, Cal. His name is Dan Hatch, and rejoices in the sobriquet of "Black Demon." He stands 5 feet 11½ inches in height, weighs 196 pounds, and has issued a challenge to any colored pugilist in the world, barring Peter Jackson, for a purse of $500 or $1,000.

IS PRESIDENT HARRISON A FREE TRADER.—The Republican Press and speakers, almost without exception, have proclaimed every Democrat as a free-trader who advocated the reform or modification of the tariff. Now that Harrison, their own President, favors a change of the tariff and an extension of the free list, will they charge that he is a free-trader, and, if not, why not? Will they so charge him, or will they admit that they did not believe what they said when they affirmed that the Democrats favored the policy of Free trade, and that they did so merely for party effect?

WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, December, 13.—Mr. Harrison and Mr. Morton are no longer on friendly terms. As much has been suspected for some time, but it was not until the trip to Chicago from which both of them returned Wednesday morning, that the suspicion became a certainty. They would not go together, not even on the same line of railroad. One had a special car on one line and one on the other, although one car would have furnished ample accommodations for both parties. In Chicago they had nothing to do with each other, and at the dedication of the auditorium, which both attended, they entered, separated, although, it was the intention of the managers of the affair that they should make their entrance arm-in-arm. It is not probable that any one thing brought about the present state of feeling between the two gentlemen—it has been steadily growing since March. Mr. Morton was a very liberal, one might say extravagant, contributor to the republican campaigne fund, and he very naturally thought that he was entitled to a little more than the fifth wheel sort of influence usually accorded the Vice President. Mr. Harrison, it seems, thought differently, hence they now confine their association to barely speaking as they pass by.

Senator Call has created a mild sort of a sensation by introducing a bill authorizing the President to open negotiation with Spain for the purchase of Cuba. Whether we want Cuba, or whether Spain wants to sell Cuba, have suddenly become interesting questions. To the first question there are many answers, mostly different. The last every one, nearly, answers in the affirmative.

Poor Mrs. Harrison! Everybody is sorry for her. She has been worrying herself to death because she could not live in the White House as she did at Indianapolis, and now to add to the good, little woman's trouble her sister Mrs. Scott Lord, has died. It will not be at all surprising if Mrs. Harrison's health should break down under the burden of sorrow. She has not been well for months.

No man ever spoke to an audience which more nearly represented the entire civilized world than was the one which gathered in the Hall of the House of Representatives, Wednesday afternoon, to hear Chief Justice Fuller deliver an address on the inauguration of Washington. The Chief Justice, though making no pretence of being an orator in the popular sense of the word, acquitted himself in a manner that was highly creditable to him, and enjoyable to his hearers. The ceremonies were held in commemoration of one hundreth anniversary of Washingtons inauguration. The real anniversary was the 30 of last April, but as Congress was not in sessio at that date it postponed its part in the centennial until December 11.

Speaker Reed has already proven that the republican managers knew what they were about when they slated him for Speaker. Never before has any Speaker announced any of the committees of the House until they were all completely made up, but so anxious are the republicans to oust some of the democratic members and give their seats to the republican contestants, that precedent was set aside and five committees announced last Monday. The committees named are Ways and Means; Appropriations; Manufactures; Elections; and Mileage. The committee on Elections is the one they wanted to get to work, as no contested election case can be acted on by the House until it is reported from that committee.

The defalcation and absconding of E. C. Silcott, Cashier of Sergeant at arms Leedom office is still worrying the members of the House and the question of whether the Treasury shall lose the $72,000 stolen or the members for whose pay it was drawn, is not decided. It is probable that it will be dead loss, as it is the opinion of shrewd lawyers that Mr. Leedoms bond of $50,000 is so drawn that it cannot be touched to make good any part of the money stolen by Silcott.

It was not intended by the administration that any official notice should be taken of the death or funeral of the late Jefferson Davis but the closing of all the departments at noon on Wednesday, on account of the Congressional centennial, caused many people to think they were closed in honor of Mr. Davis, that being the day of his funeral.

The most of the bills so far introduced are back numbers, that is, they were before Congress at the last session and failed to be acted on.

COMMISSIONER'S SALE
OF VALUABLE REAL ESTATE.

In persuance of a decree of the Circuit Court of Randolph county, West Virginia, rendered on the 28th day of September, 1889, in the suit in equity of C. Aultman & Co. vs, Jacob S. Wamsley and others, And three other causes, heard therewith, the undersigned, on the 3rd day of January, 1890 at the front door of the Court House of said county, will offer for sale at auction to the highest bidder the following described tracts of land:

50 acres, 50 acres, 500 acres, 110 acres, 125 acres, 808 acres, 180 acres, 7½ acres, 2,000 acres, 182 acres and 30 acres owned by Jacob S. Wamsley; so much of the 125 and 110 acre tracts as was not embraced by the conveyance from said Wamsley to Jacob Crouch will be sold; and so much of the 180 acre tract as was not embraced by the deed from said Wamsley to Edgor D. Wamsley will be sold. The two tracts of 50 acres each and the parcels of the 180 acres, the 125 acres and the 110 acres, not conveyed as aforesaid, together with the 7½ acres and the 41 acres compose what is known as the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley and is situate on the Tygarts Valley River in said county. The 500 acres adjoins the said farm and is principally unimproved: The 808 acres is situate in said county on Elk Water. The 2000 acres, the 182 acres and the 30 acres, adjoining each other and are situate on the waters of Greenbrier River in Pocahontas Co. and known as the "Hamilton Place;" And the 10 or 12 acres lying on mill creek, Randolph county between lands of L. C. Conrad and S. M. Wamsley and the 50 acres, Andrew Wamsley land, situate on said creek owned by Melvin Currence; And the 118 acres and 107 acres owned by Patrick Crickard, and being the same lands conveyed by him in trust to Leland Kittle; and the 94 acres, 34 acres and 2 acres owned by Phœbe A Crickard and being the same lands conveyed to her by James Moyers. The five last named tracts compose what is known as the Patrick Crickard home place, situate in Randolph county on the Tygart's Valley River near Huttonsville. A plat of the lands to be sold composing the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley, as well as the lands of the said Patrick and Phœbe A. Crickard will be made by the County Surveyor and exhibited at the sale. The home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley is largely improved, with barn, two dwelling houses, other out buildings and orchards thereon, party composed of the finest river bottom, with good uplands and in a fine state of cultivation. Upon the said 500 acre tract there is valuable timber, accessible to the Tygarts Valley River. The 808 acres on Elkwater has on it about 300 acres of fine sod, the richest soil and a good quality of timber. Upon the said "Hamilton Place" there is about 300 acres haceed, about 100 acres of which is in sod and produces the finest blue grass. The residue of the land is very rich soil with limestone and first class timber, such as cherry, ash, hemlock, &c., the 10 or 12 acres, Currence land is improved and the 50 acres is partially improved and is of rich soil with a very fine orchard of young and well selected fruit trees thereon. The said "Patrick Crickard Home Place" except the 118 acres is principally improved land of the finest river bottom, upon which is a new dwelling house, other out buildings, a good orchard and is in a high state of cultication. The 118 acres lies on the east side of the Tygarts Valley River, from the improved lands, is good soil, upon which there is the finest timber, such as white oak, poplar, &c. Such an opportunity for the purchase of valuable timber and improved lands at judicial sale is rarely offered in this section, and parties desiring to make investments in this beautiful valley with its prospects of further development by the extension of its railroad facilities, will do well to idvestigate the properties to be sold.

TERMS OF SALE.

Said lands will be sold for five per cent of the purchase money cash in hand and the residue in equal amounts upon a credit of 6, 12, 24 & 36 months with interest from the day of sale and purchasers to give notes with good security for the deferred payments.

CYRUS H. SCOTT, } Special
L. D. STRADER, } Commissioners.

I certify that bond and security has been given by the above named Commissioner as required by the decree of sale.

Madam Rumor is full this week. She says that Hillsboro will be run over with entertainments Xmas.

JUSTITIA.

Judge Lucas.

Charleston, W. Va., December 11.—Governor Wilson to-day appointed Daniel B. Lucas, of Charlestown, Jefferson county, to fill the unexpired term of Judge Thomas C. Green, who died last week, in the Supreme Court of Appeals. Term ends 1892.

A Boyish Murderer.

Joe Templeton, aged 13, was shot and killed by his brother Jeff at Union, Cabell county, last Friday. The boys were boxing and knocking off hats, and a boy named Smith struck Jeff in the mouth. This enraged him. While brooding over the blow a boy named Stowasser came up with a shotgun. Jeff grabbed the gun and emptied both barrels into his brother's face. He lived three hours, but never spoke.

An Old Woman Butchered.

A horrible butchery occurred in the East End of Cincinnati a few days ago.

The victim was Bridget Byrnes, 70 years of age, living alone. She was horribly hacked two of her fingers being entirely severed from her right hand. Her throat was cut, and half dozen other cuts disfigured her face.

The murderer is John, alias "Brocky" Smith, who is well-known in police circles. The evident object of the murder was robbery, as it was well known the old lady had considerable money about the house.

She Was Buried Alive.

A sad case of premature burial has just developed at Madison, Wis. About a month ago diptheria appeared in the home of a prominent family. A young domestic was terribly frightened, and desired to go to her home in the country, but the attending physician would not permit this. A young child died of the malady, and this, with the horror of the disease, caused the girl to take to her bed, and she apparently died in a few hours, and was at once buried by the authorities. A few days ago her parents obtained permission to remove the body to the country, and, upon opening the casket, they were horrified to discover that the body was lying on its face, the hair wrenched from the head, and the flesh literally torn from the face and hands.

JOHNSTOWN, Pa., seems to be death's play ground. On the night of the 18th, Park's Opera House was densely packed with people, when a fire alarm was sounded near by, the people thinking it was in the building made a rush for exit; the effect was a panic, resulting in the death of 11 persons, and several injured.

SENTENCED TO DEATH FOR ARSON.—A dispatch from Rocky Mount, Franklin county Va., dated the 7th inst., says:

"The trial of George Early, colored, for burning Rocky Mount, some weeks ago resulted to-day in his conviction and the sentence of death was passed upon him by the judge. Before sentence he was brought into court and testified that Bird Woods, Bill Brown and Nannie Woods were his confederates, and were present when the match was struck that consumed twenty-four buildings in Rocky Mount."

These negroes burned these building because Massey was allowed to speak in a hall which had been refused to Mahone.

A New Railroad.

A dispatch from Parkersburg, W. Va., dated the 8th of December, makes mention of an important railroad project as follows: "A railroad enterprise involving the construction of 500 miles of road and cutting through the heart of West Virginia, has been put on foot here. Senator Camden and Eastern capitalists are interested in it. The route is from the Ohio River at Marietta, up the Kanawha Valley and down the Valley of Elk River to Clifton Forge in Virginia, where the road will connect with the Chesapeake and Ohio. Engineers are now at work on this end of the route."

This is an inviting, feasible enterprise, and of vast importance to both of the Virginias. It would traverse one of the richest territories in the world. The coal and timber which would be accomodated, of themselves, would make the road remunerative. Supplemented by the products of a fertile farming and grazing country, and the travel that would be assured, there is every consideration to justify the improvement. If capitalists will unite determine upon the route the road would take, and then go in advance and purchase the coal and timber lands, they could build the road and make an enormous profit, over and above the expense of construction and equipment, out of the sale of lands after the road would reach them. That will be the policy of capitalists hereafter. That doubtless is to be the inducement which will attract a $100,000,000 English syndicate that has been recently formed to invest in new railroad projects in this country and develop mineral lands.

F. B. Gown, a prominent, Pennsylvanian, committed suicide in Washington, on the 14th inst.

FELIX KEMP, who murdered his children in Charleston, some time ago has been sentenced to death for his friendish crime.

Constipation,

If not remedied in season, is liable to become habitual and chronic. Drastic purgatives, by weakening the bowels, confirm, rather than cure, the evil. Ayer's Pills, being mild, effective, and strengthening in their action, are generally recommended by the faculty as the best of aperients.

"Having been subject, for years, to constipation, without being able to find much relief, I at last tried Ayer's Pills. I deem it both a duty and a pleasure to testify that I have derived great benefit from their use. For over two years past I have taken one of these pills every night before retiring. I would not willingly be without them."—G. W. Bowman, 26 East Main st., Carlisle, Pa.

"I have been taking Ayer's Pills and using them in my family since 1857, and cheerfully recommend them to all in need of a safe but effectual cathartic." —John M. Boggs, Louisville, Ky.

"For eight years I was afflicted with constipation, which at last became so bad that the doctors could do no more for me. Then I began to take Ayer's Pills, and soon the bowels recovered their natural and regular action, so that now I am in excellent health."

Words of Wisdom.

Hypocracy is the necessary burden of villainy.

When a man's temper gets the best of him it reveals the worst of him.

It is a curious fact in the run of things that it is easier to be thoroughly orthodox than to be thoroughly good.

A bad habit is like a cat in that it has many lives, and like a cat you will have to kill it nine times before you are sure it is dead.

Equity had been gradually snapping itself into a refined science which human faculties could master without long and intense application.

The chief ingredients in the composition of those qualities that gain estrem and praise are good nature, truth, good sence and good breeding.

A more glorious victory cannot be gained over another man than this, that when the injury began on his part the kindness should begin on ours.

Libraries are the wardrobes of literature, whence men, properly informed, might bring forth ornament, much for curiosity, and more for use.

If a man does not make new acquaintances as he passes through life he will soon find himself alone. A man should keep his friendship in constant repair.

It is hard to persenate and act a part long; for where truth is not at the bottom, nature will always be endeavoring to return, and will pass out and betray herself one time or another.

There is nothing that makes a man suspect much, than to know little; and therefore men should remedy suspicion by striving to know more, and not to keep their suspicions in smother.

A man that hath no virtue in himself ever envieth virtue in others; for men's minds will either feed upon their own good, or upon others' evil; and who waneth one will prey upon the other.

They that govern most make least noise. You see when they row in a barge they that do drugery work slash and puff and sweat, but he that governs sits quietly at the stern and scarce is seen to stir.

Such is the force of envy and ill-nature that the failings of good men are more published to the world than their good deeds, and that one fault of a deserving man shall meet with more reproaches than all his virtues will with praise.

Mother Nature causes a great deal less trouble than mother Habit.

A man experiences "that sinking feeling" when he falls overboard.

"I've had a great many trials in my time," remarked the veteran criminal sadly.

A little girl, who made very frequent use of the word "guess," was one day reproved for it by her teacher.

"Don't say 'guess,' Mary," said Miss Jones; "say 'presume.'"

Presently one of Mary's little playmates coming up to her, remarked:

"I think your cape is very pretty, and my mamma wants your mamma to lend her the pattern, because she is going to make me one like it."

"My mamma has no pattern," was the prompt reply; "she cut it by presume."

ROMANCE OF A STORE.

A tiny room, behind a tiny shop. In one corner, near the fire-place, an elderly lady in a deep, cushioned chair—a lady whose face bore traces of pain conquered, suffering overcome, patient, delicate and refined. Her dress and attitude told the story of invalidism. Opposite to her, standing up and leaning upon the mantel-piece, a girl of twenty one or two; tall, straight and strong, with a face of some beauty, great resolution, and sweet, womanly grace.

Rhoda Lewis was the younger lady, and her mother the gentle invalid.

"Where are you going, dear? The shop-bell did not ring," Mrs. Lewis said as Rhoda moved toward the door.

"To put up the shutters. It is nine o'clock."

"They are so heavy," the invalid sighed.

"But I am so strong," the girl answered, lightly.

Yet, as she lifted the heavy shutter in her small, white hands, she was not sorry to have it taken from her into a strong, masculine grasp, that quickly adjusted the shutters, put up the iron bar, shot the padlock bolt into place, locked it, and gave the key to Rhoda. Not a word spoken all this time, but as her cousin, Frank Lewis, gave her the key, Rhoda said, demurely and formally:

"Thank you."

Quite as formally, yet with a ring of sarcasm in his voice, that had not been in hers, he replied:

"You are very welcome."

She stood twisting the key in her fingers till he said:

"Well?" But if he intended the word for a question, there was no answer. Rhoda let her hands fall, and looked straight before her.

"Are you not going to ask me in?" Frank inquired.

"No."

"Father has been here to-day?"

"Yes."

"Got his rent?"

"Yes."

"And told you to shut your door on me?"

"Yes."

"'Yes—yes.' Can't you speak, Rhoda?"

"Not now. Some insults are very hard to bear; your father's was one of them."

She slipped in at the store door as she spoke, and fastened it quickly. She was in total darkness, having closed the door of the inner room as she left it. For a moment she stood leaning heavily upon the counter, trembling violently, with the quick breathing that tells of suppressed tears. Only for a moment; then she went in to her mother, her sweet face all love and cheerfulness. Whatever her heartache was, it was evidently not to be added to her mother's burdens.

Frank, left so unceremoniously, gave vent to his chagrin in a low whistle, thrust his hands deep into his overcoat pocket, and strode homeward. It was a cheerless windy evening, and chilled, angered and miserable, the young man tossed aside hat and coat in the hall of his father's pretentious house, and entered the parlor. A grand room, richly furnished, in sharp contrast to the shabby little back parlor where Frank had intended to pass the next hour.

Mr. Lewis was seated beside an open grate, reading the evening newspaper. He did not look up as his son drew up a chair near his own, and said:

"Father, what have you been saying to-day to Rhoda?"

"I gave her to understand that I did not want a penniless daughter-in-law."

"Father!"

"You may as well understand the same. I will not encourage such nonsense any longer. You are old enough now to drop flirtations, and think seriously of marriage."

"I won't stand it," cried Frank, hotly.

"Won't stand what?"

"Any interference between Rhoda and myself. I mean to win Rhoda for my wife; and I meant it when she wore long braids and short dresses; when she lived in a house as grand as this one."

"All very well then. Matters are different now."

"There is no difference in my love for Rhoda."

"A pauper! The daughter of a bankrupt who committed suicide!"

"Your brother!"

"Well, what of that! He never asked me to help him, or——" was the harsh voice husky? Frank wondered—"I might have been idiot enough to do it!"

"It was a pity he could not know that. Father!" in a softened tone, "don't stand between Rhoda and me! I won't give her up, but you make her hard to win. She is as proud to-day as she was when her carriage drove up to our door, and she brought you fruit from her hot-house. No, I am wrong! She was not proud, then, Heaven bless her! but she is now!"

"Beggars have no right to be proud! I won't have it! Do you understand? If you persist in this folly, you may suit yourself to the situation, for your allowance stops; stops, understand, the day you propose to your cousin Rhoda. You can find a home and an income elsewhere."

"I don't mind that threat, but I should be very unhappy if I left you alone, father."

"Don't do it, then."

"But it will make my life utterly wretched to give up my cousin."

"Bah! Go to bed. You're a headstrong boy, and you have not tasted poverty yet. Keep your heroics till you have."

Frank Lewis knew that there were some moods in which his father was utterly stubborn, and that to argue was to take time for no result. So he accepted his dismissal, and went to his own room. Thinking deeply, he came to the resolution to try his power to conquer fortune before seeing Rhoda again. She knew he loved her, and if his love was returned, would trust him; if she cared for him only in a cousinly way, then the separation might help him to bear a later disappointment. He would not desert his father, but perhaps when he had proved himself no braggart, his father might relent.

It was dreary enough in the weeks that followed in the tiny parlor, behind the little stationer's store where Rhoda Lewis strove to keep the wolf from the door. Brought up in utter ignorance of business, the young storekeeper had depended unconsciously upon her cousin Frank in all financial difficulties. Frank had taught her how to keep her books, had given her instructions about renewing her stock in trade, managed her banking business, had been her adviser and best friend from the day when she returned from her fathers funeral, to know she must be breadwinner for herself and her invalid mother. She had never looked upon him as a lover, only as her very dear cousin, until her uncle rudely opened her eyes and heart by informing her of the penalty attach- to his son's courtship. Then love awakened to sting her sharply when pride forbade her cherishing the sweet intruder.

Yet, while she suffered in heart, there was a magic of prosperity about the tiny store. Customers flocked to her, and she found sale for a better class of goods than she had ventured upon at first. She had some skill in water-color painting, no wonderful talent, but sufficient capacity for much of the pretty decorating, just at that time coming into fashion. For what she had leisure to accomplish in that line, she found quick sale at large profit.

Her sorest grief was in her mother's wasting health, and the certainty that a long standing disease must terminate fatally, though the decline was very slow. Heart and brain were sorely taxed, the more that she had been so carefully guarded from all care and sorrow during her father's life. But she was brave and faithful in the discharge of daily duty, trusting in God's care for her future, as humbly as a child trusts its mother.

Two years had passed since Frank Lewis put up her shutters, when he wrote to her from another city telling her that he had a good position, was working faithfully to make himself independent, and asking her to be his wife if his income ever filled his pockets sufficiently to start a home.

"I tried to work in my old home, to bear my father," he wrote, "but it was better for me to be away for a time."

It was a strange, deep happiness that met this letter, for Rhoda knew she loved her cousin as the one love of her life. She wrote back at once, frankly and lovingly, and the correspondence became her ray of sunshine in her sorrow for her mother and her daily toil for bread. Still the months rolled into years, Rhoda was left motherless, and the stern old man in the grand home Frank had left grew more lonely and desolate as age crept on, till four years had passed, and Frank came for his bride.

Before seeking her he went to his old home, and unannounced entered the room where his father sat musing idly, his hands resting on his lap, his eyes fixed upon the fire. He did not look up as Frank entered, thinking it was a servant who came in, and his son's heart sank as he saw how old and worn he looked. Surely, four years ago his hair was not so gray and thin, his face so deeply lined. Suddenly he roused himself, looked toward the door, and then, opening his arms, cried, with yearning tenderness:

"My boy! Frank, my son!"

It was long before he could do more than stroke his son's hands and hair, speaking fondest words of affection.

"You will not leave me again, Frank he pleaded.

"Not unless you forbid Rhoda to be here, too."

"So, so! You have not wavered, then, in all these four years?"

"Have not my letters told you so much?"

"Right! Yes, yes, you are constant. You thought me a hard father, Frank?"

"Only in that one thing. You have been a good father to me."

"But not a kind one? I see where I made a mistake. But I meant only kindness, Frank; only kindness. I married when I was young like yourself, the son of a rich father. My wife was a butterfly of fashion. I was an earnest man, striving to do life's duties faithfully. I was utterly miserable in my married life, and wherever I looked I see how money and its possession crushed out real love. When you first loved Rhoda you were mere children, but even then I hoped it was transcient fancy. Then came my brother's misfortunes, and Rhoda's opportunity to prove herself a a strong, true, woman, or a feeble nursling of luxury. You, too, were drifting into the idle follies of a man without a purpose in life. I resolved to test you both, to prove your love and manhood, as I was proving Rhoda's courage.

"Well, well, my dear boy you were not quite so independent, after all, as you fancied. My letters procured you the favorable reception you met with at Morse & Co.'s, and half your salary came out of my pocket. I have watched your cousin's interests, too. She would be surprised if she knew how large a customer I have been, by proxy, and how carefully I have respected her honest pride while putting money in her till. It is all over. I am an old man, Rhoda is alone, so you must come to me. Shall we go now and see Rhoda?"

They had turned the corner of the street where the little store was located, when Frank, gently pushing his father back, whispered:

"Wait one moment."

Rhoda was standing in the doorway, and her errand boy was putting up the shutters, when they were taken from his hands.

"You can go," Frank said, deftly taking his work and gravely attending to it until he gave the key to Rhoda.

"Thanks," she said, having had time to gain composure after the first shock of surprise.

"May I come in?"

"And may I come, too?" said a third voice.

"Uncle William!"

"Yes my dear. Come Frank."

Then the store door closed behind the three, and customers were fastened out while the old story ends, and a new life opens for my hero and heroine.

"Well sir," said the railway superintendent to a foreign looking man who had gained admittance to his presence, "what do you want?"

"I would like a situation on your road."

"No place for you, I think."

"But there is. I want to be interpreter."

"Interpreter?"

"Yes, sir. To tell the passengers what the brakeman says when he is calling out the names of the stations."

The superintendent studied a few minutes and then told the man to call later.

"And how is your husband, Mrs. McCarty? Is he as hard a worker as ever?"

"No; John ain't worked 'a day for seventeen years."

"Is he incapacitated?"

"No, ma'am; he's dead."

He—"Will you marry me?"

She—"No."

He—"Then will you marry Bob Sawyer? He wanted me to ask you for him, too, while I was about it."

The man who resolves to quit drinking must be in sober earnest.

Carpets are bought by the yard and soled by the foot.

CHRISTMAS.

A happy Christmas to one and all of our readers! Again the season is here when everybody is expected to rejoice and entertain nothing but good feeling. It is not, however, a time of gladness to all; but rather a time of extreme feelings. The happy are happier; the sad, on account of the contrast, are sadder; the good are better; and the wicked are more wicked.

There are many different ways of using the time; but to none does the approach of Christmas mean so much of genuine happiness as to those who make it a time of family reunion and home enjoyment. Parents and children long separated for a few days at least, lay aside their ordinary employment that they may gather round the old hearthstone that they may spend a while in quiet but deep enjoyment. Some measure enjoyment by the noise they make, some by the whiskey they drink, some by the turkey they eat, but none of these know true happiness. Let us pause and think that the day commemorates the advent of Him who when He come proclaimed "Peace upon earth and good will to men." In the spirit of that declaration, let us make it a time of peace and good will; forgetting all strife, casting out all malice and indulging nothing but good wishes and good deeds.

Gentlemen inclined to grumble about the expense of the merry Christmastide should consider the unfortunate King and Siam. The majesty of Siam has just annexed twenty more wives. Consequently he has made, it is said, an offer to buy out John Wanamaker's store, and proposes to hang most of it in the hosiery department. Pity the King of Siam. His Christmas comes high, but then he must have it.

WASHINGTON LETTER

[From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON, December, 20.—Senator Morgan thinks the State department is entirely too poky in the matter of recognizing the new government of Brazil, therefore he has offered a joint resolution congratulating the people of Brazil on their recent peaceful revolution and authorizing the President to issue a proclamation recognizing the republic as a sovereign power.

Speaker Reed is believed to favor having the House decide the contested election cases before any Rules are adopted. It would be a violation of all precedent, but precedent doesn't count for much with some people when it happens to clash with party advantage. The Speaker has almost absolute power over the House while it remains as it is now —only governed by ordinary parliamentary rules, and if the election cases were before the House the unseating of nearly every democrat whose seat is contested would be an absolute certainty. But it is doubtful whether the republican managers are prepared to take the responsibility of adopting such a radical programme. They will be apt to remember that in all probability the next House will have a majority of democrats, and this belief will make them careful.

Congress was to have begun its Christmas holidays on Thursday, but to accommodate Speaker Reed, who wishes to announce the rest of the House committees before the recess, the resolution was amended to read from Saturday, the 21 inst. to January 6, and in that shape was passed. An unusually large number of Congressmen will eat their Christmas turkeys away from Washington.

Some over-liberal democrats in the House came very near doing a very curious, not to say silly, thing this week. It was to assume the responsibility for the money stolen by Silcott. The idea of raising a purse among the democrats to make good the losses of the republican Representative seemed to be so cathing that a call for a democratic caucus to endorse the idea was issued, but upon reflection it was rescinded, and the matter allowed to remain just as it was—uncertain. The House, without a division, has passed a resolution authorizing a reward of $5,000 for Silcott.

Deficiency bills are always common under republican administration, and they have already begun under the present. A bill appropriating $150,000 to make up a deficiency in the first six months of the current fiscal year at the Government printing office, and another appropriating $250,000 to pay for printing for the census bureau, have become laws this week.

A concurrent resolution has been passed by House and Senate tendering to Chief Justice Fuller the thanks of Congress for the address delivered by him on the occasion of the celeoration of Washington's inauguration.

Senator Brown, of Georgia, is the only member of the Senate that has not occupied his seat this session, although several others, including Senator Hampton, have not been here before this week.

In spite of the determined opposition of Senators Call, Jones, of Arkansas, Berry, Colquill, Reagan, Blair and Wilson, of Iowa, the nomination of Justice Brewer has been confirmed.

Senator Chandler charges that certain naval officers are banded together for the purpose of Congressional lobbying. He has offered in the Senate a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for information.

Mr. Harrison, thinking probably to give some people an unusually happy Christmas has made this week a large number of appointments—the most of them being postmasters.

Senator Quay and Representative Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, will not be very close friends for some time. They both had candidates for the Pittsburg postoffice. Of course Mr. Quay's man got the office.

It is probable that two new States will be admitted by this Congress. The Senate Committee on Territories has agreed to report favorably the bills providing for the admission of Idaho and Wyoming. The democrats will endeavor to have New Mexico included.

Last Wednesday the House passed a resolution ordering a call of states for the introduction of bills, and there was a perfect shower of them poured out, on almost every conceivable subject. It was the first general opportunity, to introduce bills, of the present session. At least ninety per cent of the bills introduced will never again be heard from, and there is no good reason why they should be.

The Senate bill making $72 a month the rate of pensions to be paid for total disability has been favorably reported.

COMMISSIONER'S SALE

OF VALUABLE REAL ESTATE.

In persuance of a decree of the Circuit Court of Randolph county, West Virginia, rendered on the 28th day of September, 1889, in the suit in equity of C. Aultman & Co. vs. Jacob S. Wamsley and others, And three other causes, heard therewith, the undersigned, on the 3rd day of January, 1890 at the front door of the Court House of said county, will offer for sale at auction to the highest bidder the following described tracts of land:

50 acres, 50 acres, 500 acres, 110 acres, 125 acres, 808 acres, 180 acres, 7½ acres, 2,000 acres, 132 acres and 30 acres owned by Jacob S. Wamsley; so much of the 125 and 110 acre tracts as was not embraced by the conveyance from said Wamsley to Jacob Crouch will be sold; and so much of the 180 acre tract as was not embraced by the deed from said Wamsley to Edgor D. Wamsley will be sold. The two tracts of 50 acres each and the parcels of the 180 acres, the 125 acres and the 110 acres, not conveyed as aforesaid, together with the 7½ acres and the 41 acres compose what is known as the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley and is situate on the Tygarts Valley River in said county. The 500 acres adjoins the said farm and is principally unimproved: The 808 acres is situate in said county on Elk Water. The 2000 acres, the 132 acres and the 30 acres, adjoining each other and are situate on the waters of Greenbrier River in Pocahontas Co. and known as the "Hamilton Place;" And the 10 or 12 acres lying on mill creek, Randolph county between lands of L. C. Conrad and S. M. Wamsley and the 50 acres, Andrew Wamsley land, situate on said creek owned by Melvin Currence; And the 118 acres and 107 acres owned by Patrick Crickard, and being the same lands conveyed by him in trust to Leland Kittle; and the 94 acres, 34 acres and 2 acres owned by Phœbe A Crickard and being the same lands conveyed to her by James Moyers. The five last named tracts compose what is known as the Patrick Crickard home place, situate in Randolph county on the Tygart's Valley River near Huttonsville. A plat of the lands to be sold composing the home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley, as well as the lands of the said Patrick and Phœbe A. Crickard will be made by the County Surveyor and exhibited at the sale. The home farm of the said Jacob S. Wamsley is largely improved, with barn, two dwelling houses, other but buildings and orchards thereon, party composed of the finest river bottom, with good uplands and in a fine state of cultivation. Upon the said 500 acre tract there is valuable timber, accessible to the Tygarts Valley River. The 808 acres on Elkwater has on it about 300 acres of fine sod, the richest soil and a good quality of timber. Upon the said "Hamilton Place" there is about 300 acres haceed, about 100 acres of which is in sod and produces the finest blue grass. The residue of the land is very rich soil with limestone and first class timber, such as cherry, ash, hemlock, &c, the 10 or 12 acres, Currence land is improved and the 50 acres is partially improved and is of rich soil with a very fine orchard of young and well selected fruit trees thereon. The said "Patrick Crickard Home Place" except the 118 acres is principally improved land of the finest river bottom, upon which is a new dwelling house, other out buildings, a good orchard and is in a high state of cultication. The 118 acres lies on the east side of the Tygarts Valley River, from the improved lands, is good soil, upon which there is the finest timber, such as white oak, poplar, &c. Such an opportunity for the purchase of valuable timber and improved lands at judicial sale is rarely offered in this section, and parties desiring to make investments in this beautiful valley with its prospects of further development by the extension of its railroad facilities, will do well to idvestigate the properties to be sold.

TERMS OF SALE.

Said lands will be sold for five per cent of the purchase money cash in hand and the residue in equal amounts upon a credit of 4, 12, 24 & 36 months with interest from the day of sale and purchasers to give notes with good security for the deferred payments.

CYRUS H. SCOTT, } Special
L. D. STRADER, } Commissioners.

I certify that bond and security has been given by the above named Commissioner as required by the decree of sale.

Thomas Creek Items.

Not seeing anything in your paper from this community I will endeavor to give you a few items.

Mrs. Carpenter who has been sick for some time, we are happy to say is convalescent.

Robert Griffin, of Traveler's Repose is attending school here.

Rev. Hannah has just closed a series of meeting at Mt. Zoin. There were four conversions and about ten penitents when the meeting closed.

Prof. Sterling Ward, of Huttonsville, has been visiting friends and forming acquaintances in this place.

Our school which has been successfully taught by Floyd E. Stalnaker, will close the 31st and he will commence another near Traveler's Repose.

Rev. Dellenger delivered an able sermon at Baxter church last Sabbath.

Though our vicinity is blessed with peaceable, kind and industrious people, we are sorry to say we have one ignoramous villian who goes to preaching and interrupts the preacher, cuts the peoples bridles and steals somebody's horse and rides it off. We hope he will get justice which will be in Moundsville.

Success to THE TIMES.

M. G. MATHEWS, Pres.

Clarksburg, W. Va., December 21.—This morning about four o'clock, Berry Coffma, a farmer of this county, shot and killed Charles Shrieves, another farmer, near Lumberport. It seems that Coffman had his land posted, and that Shrieves was trespassing when the shooting occurred. The particulars, however, cannot be ascertained, as the friends of Coffman say nothing. It is rumored that a feud has existed for some time between Coffman and Shrieves, of the nature of which your correspondent is not informed. It is a sad affair because of the prominence of the parties concerned. Coffman was lodged in jail at Clarksburg this morning, and it is doubtful whether he will be bailed. No preliminary examination was had, and it very likely from the facts that it will be waived.

Serious Result of a Practical Joke

At the government printing office a few days ago one of the young woman employed there suddenly suspended a toy mouse before the face of another female employee. The latter was so badly frightened that she fainted. Her fainting was followed by spasms. Realizing the serious consequences of her playfulness, the joker in turn became frightened and becoming suddenly ill hastened to the toilet room, where she, too, fainted and afterwards had hemorrhages. For awhile it was feared that both women would die, but they were soon well enough to be removed to their homes.—Washington Star.

Verdict in the Cronin Case.

The verdict of the Jury in the trial of the murderers of Dr. Cronin in Chicago was rendered Monday afternoon as follows:—

"We, the jury, find the defendant, John F. Beggs, not guilty. We, the jury, find the defendant, John Kunze, guilty of man slaughter as charged in the indictment, and fix his punishment at imprisonment in the pentientiary for a term of three years. We, the jury, find the defendants Daniel Coughlin, Patrick O'Sullivan and Martin Burke, guilty of murder in the manner and form as charged in the indictment, and fix the penalty at imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of their natural lives."

Two bars of silver fell from a truck in New York which was employed in hauling $400,000 worth to a steamer for shipment to England. Although there was a fortune in each, nobody picked them up and made off, as they weighed about a half ton each.

GREAT ENTERPRISE.

The Surveys for the Ohio and West Virginia Road Completed.

ELLENBORO, W. VA., December 15—The preliminary survey of the proposed Ohio and West Virginia Southern Railroad has been completed, and Chief Engineer Keenly has filed his report of the route. Through the kindness of Mr. Tom G. Strickler the Register representative is enabled to give its readers the route, distances and probable cost. The route runs from Marietta up the Ohio side for ten miles where it is proposed to bridge the Ohio at the mouth of Cow creek in Wood county; this stream is followed to Douglass run in Ritchie county, a distance of ten miles, thence down Bear run four miles, to Cornwallis, crossing the B. & O. railroad here and following Hughes river four and one-half miles to Harrisville. From Harrisville the route runs down Indian creek to Jinnett's mills following Kane run to the Middle Fork of Hughes river thence up Bone creek to Troy, Gilmer county, where the road penetrates the big coal fields of that section; thence dowh Sand Fork to intersect the Black Diamond route, crossing the Kanawha river several miles east and above Glenville, this point of intersection with the Black Diamond, and only 600 feet of tunneling will be required. The route extends on through Gilmer, Braxton and Pocahontas counties, Clifton Forge, Va., being the terminus, but the Troy coal field is the objective point at present. Ohio capitalists are building the road and issuing bonds. They claim $17,000 or $18,000 per mile will build it. A right of way fund is now being raised, and Union district, this county, has voted $25,000 to the enterprise. Indications are that the road will be built at once and will open up a heretofore undeveloped country rich in minerals and timber.—Register.

LIFE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

We have just received from the publishers a very full and comprehensive book under the title, Life and Death of Jefferson Davis, giving a full history of his eventful life and death, together with Funeral Services, also comments of the press from all parts of the country. It will be sent postpaid to any address on receipt of 25 cents, by J. S. Ogilvie, the publisher, 57 Rose St., New York, who also desires agents to sell it.

The special session of the Legislature is called to meet in Charleston Jan. 15th, for the purpose of determining the contested election between A. B. Fleming and Nathan Goff for the office of Governor of W. Va.

The suicide of Franklin B. Gowen, once President of the Reading Railroad, was led up to by his generally breaking the Fourth commandment in working on the Sabbath. Neither mind nor matter can long endure the strain of activity without one-seventh of rest. An earthly lawyer, he has now gone to give an account to the One Lawgiver of the way in which he kept his Law.

Seven thousand Pennsylvania miners are out of work. Christmas tide will not bring much joy to these.

Felix Kemp who murdered his two children in Charleston some time ago has been sentenced to be hanged on March 7.

W. A. McCorkle, of Charleston, who slapped Federal Marshal White in the face for a remark about Jefferson Davis and who whipped an editor of that town, has been presented with a gold-headed cane.

At Charlottesville, Va., Dec. 11, the jury in the case of F. C. Morgan, the young Englishman on trial for killing J. D. Coles, rendered a verdict of eighteen months in the penitentiary, and sentence was imposed.

JOLLY BOB BURDETTE.

He Tells What He Would Do Could He Be Changed Into a Woman.

What would I do if I were a woman?

I would try to be a man. Cut that out and paste it on your looking glass, daughter, and it will be an ornament of grace unto thy head and chains about thy neck many times a day.

I wouldn't shudder and groan every time the name of the monster was mentioned, but I would studiously avoid acquiring the lightest of his many accomplishments and the best of his manifold ways.

I would never learn to lay a fire in range or fire place. Every time I touched a fire, summer or winter, I would put it dead out. Then I'd never be expected to make one.

The first loaf of bread I baked I would let it drop on the dog and kill him. Then I'd never be asked to bake bread again, and I'd get a new dog.

When I descended into the laundry I would mannage to bring out all the fancy flannels white as ghosts, and all the shirts as blue as the sky of June. Then I'd never be asked to assist at the washtub again.

I would pinch every baby that was given me to hold black and blue in half a dozen places before it could catch its breath enough to shriek, and I would frighten the life or tease the temper out of anybody's children whom I was asked to amuse. Then I'd never be troubled with other people's young ones, and nobody would ever ask me to teach the infant class while the tired teacher took a vacation.

If I had to sit on the front seat when asked to drive, I would carry a large sun umbrella and gouge the driver's eyes out and run the team into a fence corner the first mile out. Then I'd get the back seat on the shady side every time afterwards.

I would always sit sideways in a street car. Then I would have plenty of room.

I would wear a carriage dress in the street-car if I had no other place in which to show it off.

I would smash something choice and expensive every time I swept a room or dusted a parlor. Then I'd never be asked to do such work.

In church I would never rise during the singing and never kneel during prayers. Then people would notice me and say: "Who is that pretty girl with such lovely eyes?"

At the theater I would wear the biggest hat obtainable.

At cricket and lawn-tennis matches I would sit in the front row and raise my parasol.

I would cultivate such charming helplessness, such hopeless ignorance, such pretty, childish ignorance, such fascinating dependence, such dainty baby ways that people would say: "O, we must take care of her; she doesn't understand these things." Then all my life long I would be petted, and coddled, and fondled, and cared for in a thousand ways where more independent women have to "hustle" for themselves.

That is, daughter, if other women would care for such a sweet little bit of helplessness. May be they would. You know better than I do how woman regard that sort of a woman.

But, you can gamble your peace of mind, your love of ease and all your enjoyments of life that the Monster Man wouldn't torment the solitude of such a woman with his presence longer than a day or two, and she would thus be spared one of the greatest annoyances to which mankind is subjected.

Pearls of Thought.

Be true. No one but a coward lies.

Be proud. A proud man cannot be mean.

Be bold. It is the only way to command confidence.

Accumulate. The more you own the more power you have.

Be quick. You can't use a minute but once—make the most of it.

Be clean. If your body and character are spotless nothing can shame you.

Who, then, is unconquerable? He whom the inevitable cannot overcome.

Be careful. A heedless word or act may cost you a year's work or a lifetime of pain.

Be honest. Credit is the premium paid for honesty. Run in debt only when it is necessary; and never unless you are reasonably sure you can pay.

A beautiful person is like a fountain, watering the earth and spreading fertility; it is therefore more delightful and more honorable to give than to receive.

Multitude of jealousies, and lack of some predominant desire that should marshal and put in order all the rest, maketh any man's heart hard to find or sound.

Never look back. You can't help the mistakes you have made. Don't think of what you have achieved, but of what you may accomplish.

"Marry your sweetheart on your birth day, if you can young man. It will save you money every year in anniversary presents."

WHAT SANTA CLAUS DID FOR JIMMIE BAXTER.

A miserable and wet Christmas Eve. The rain driving sheets and the wind ruthlessly blowing umbrellas inside out and making pedestrians feel anything but firm on their legs. The street cars were all crowded with dripping humanity in very unamiable moods, and still less amiable were those individuals who, from business necessity had to walk. The gutters ran like rivers, the wind shrieked through the bare branches of the trees in City Hall park, and the sine qua non of that locality, the newsboy, was silent and invisible.

Behind one of the pillars of the city hall portico little Jimmie Baxter stood with shivering limbs and chattering teeth. He was of the shoe black persuasion, and as it had been raining persistently all day, his business profits were represented by a cipher. Jimmie was an orphan of the tender age of eight, tall for his age, with a bright, open countenance that bespoke a fearless honesty and a determination to succeed if success could be attained. His parents had both died while he was a mere baby, he had been handed over to the tender mercies of a drunken aunt whose treatment of Jimmie was always proportioned to the amount of money he brought her in. For even from the day he could walk she had compelled him to go out on the streets and on [illegible] earn a living. And from the day's financial returns Jimmie deemed it inadvisable for him to go home.

"Just my luck!" he exclaimed, his teeth chattering at every word. "Christmas eve, too, and I ain't got but a nickel left to git su'thing to eat wid, and nowheres to sleep. Guess I'll go over to the postoffice an' to get warm agin one of the heaters. Lord, how the wind blows!"

Jimmie buttoned his little coat tight up to his chin, pressed his cap down on his head, and made a run for the Park Row entrance of the postoffice. He succeeded in getting across the plazza and through the park without incident, but just as he was crossing Mail street a vagrant umbrella came tearing along from Broadway and knocked the legs from under Jimmie, throwing him on his back, while it continued its way over toward the Tribune building.

The shoeblack picked himself up ruefully for he had fallen into a pool of water and his clothes were wet through, but before he could continue his journey a huge female form loomed up beside him and a strong voice exclaimed breathlessly:

"Ye little rascal, why didn't you stop it?"

"Stop which?" inquired Jimmie sarcastically, "the umbrella or the wind?"

"The umbrella, you mischievous little imp," exclaimed the old lady, excitedly. "I've a good mind to have you arrested for not recovering my property."

"Wot's de matter wid me suing yer for damages meself?" returned Jimmie scornfully. "I've ruined my new Christmas suit all through yer blamed umbrella! Yer ought to be charged with losing control of yer property, and allowing it to run at large!"

This was the last straw to the exasperated lady, and lacking the proper means of chastisement by the loss of her umbrella, she swung around her hand bag and made a vicious blow at Jimmie, accompanying the movement with words much more forcible than elegant. Jimmie dodged the bag easily enough, but either the force of the blow or the force of the wind, or both made the reticule fly open, and out came a shower of papers, deeds and crisp new bills.

"Oh, little boy, dear little boy!" exclaimed the old lady, in genuine distress, "please help me pick up the papers, and I'll give you a dollar—two dollars—five dollars—ten dollars—only please help me, won't you?"

Jimmie's natural anger at the crossgrained woman had given way to his general impulses the moment he noticed the accident. There was nobody else in the vicinity, and the papers were blowing in all directions, but the nimble shoeblack had soon collected them all and a dirty wet and miserable heap they looked.

"Come into the postoffice, ma'am," said Jimmie, "and I'll wipe all the mud off of 'em for you."

The lady, who was much more alarmed than angry now, accompanied Jim into the postoffice, while after ten minutes' rubbing with his ragged handkerchief, he managed to get the thick of the dirt off the papers. There were several documents with heavy red seals, some letters, and $2,000 in bills of large denominations. The sight of the latter made poor Jim's eyes water, but he scrupulously handed every thing back to his companion.

"Where do you live, boy?" asked the old lady, suddenly.

"I don't live nowhere," replied Jim, with more emphasis than grammar. "Leastwise I ain't got no regular home. I'm an orphan, ma'am!"

"But where do you get your meals?" she continued.

"Well I ain't so pertikler where I gets 'em, as when an' how I gets 'em," responded Jim, truthfully. "I ain't had nuthin' to eat since breakfast, an' I'm wet through."

"Well just come with me, and we'll soon remedy that," said the old lady, with a suspicious glisten in her eyes, and Jim followed her through to the south end of the building and thence to a Fulton street restaurant.

When they had taken their seats opposite each other, and had ordered what appeared to Jim to be a sumptuous banquet, the shoeblack had to admit to himself that she wasn't such an ill looking old lady after all. Her round, ruddy face beamed upon him so benevolently that he felt great compunctions for having been rude to her. And with Jimmie to feel was to speak.

"You'll excuse me for being so sassy just now, marm," he began, his clear, honest eyes looking full into hers, "but I felt so cold and hungry and miserable when your umbrella knocked me over, that it made me kinder savage, an' I didn't know wot I said."

The lady smiled placidly and nodded her head, but said nothing in reply. Presently, however, she asked, "What is your name, boy?"

"James Baxter," replied the shoeblack, "but I'm always called Jimmie around here."

"Baxter—James Baxter," repeated the old lady, with her keen eyes fixed upon him. "You said you were an orphan, do you remember your mother's name—her name before she was married?"

"Yes," said Jimmie promptly; "I saw it written in a prayer book wot my aunt threw in the fire the other day."

"What was it?"

"Lucy Sanford."

The old lady's eyes glistened and her hands trembled visibly. She muttered something to herself, but it was too low for even Jim's sharp ears to catch.

"What aunt of yours threw the book in the fire?" she suddenly asked.

"Aunt Matilda—father's sister," answered Jimmie. "She drinks, and she's a bad lot altogether. She used to spank me when I wasn't able to crawl, 'cose I didn't go beg in the streets for money for her to get gin with."

"She did eh," exclaimed the old lady hotly; "then Matilda Baxter, I'll hear of this as sure as my name's—— Aint you hungry, little boy? there's the beef steaks, so lets start in on them."

Although Jimmie ate heartily and silently, he could not help wondering at the strange lady's manner, for she rarely if ever, took her eyes off him, and made but a poor pretence of eating at all.

Meanwhile Jimmie's new found friend had pursuaded one of the waiters to go purchase her another umbrella, and when the repast was over the queerly assorted pair went out in quest of a boy's clothing store. In less than an hour Jimmie was transformed from a shoe black into a fashionably dressed little gentleman. Then she took him to the Astor house, where in the morning Jimmie found the following note on the bureau in his room:

"I am your Aunt Jane from Boston, and have gone to give your other aunt a bit of my mind. There's money in your pockets—get your breakfast and wait for me. You'll go to Boston with me to morrow."

Jimmie rubbed his eyes and pinched his arms to make sure that he was awake. He had never heard of Aunt Jane of Boston, but was perfectly willing to have one according to the sample he had seen.

In a short time the aunt returned glowing and puffing with excitement. She kissed Jimmie and said he looked handsome, which he certainly did. Then she explained that she was his mother's eldest sister, and was abroad at the time of the death of his parent. She had been given to understand that he was dead also, and had simply discovered his existence by accident. As she was a widow and childless, she wished Jimmie to go with her and share her comfortable home in Boston. Her present visit to New York had been to adjust some financial business connected with her deceased husband's property, and she had enough to keep them in luxury forever.

Jimmie took no time to deliberate, but settled the matter right there. Between a drunken aunt, rags and poverty, and the kind old lady and comfort, there was but one choice for him, and to-day, as he sits in his own cozy law office, in which his aunt's wealth and influence placed him, he does not regret the ill-humored wind that blew the old lady's umbrella against him and sent him sprawling in the mud.

Bad Boy (getting in a body blow)—There, take that!

Good Boy (folding his arms with a saintly expression)—No, Tommy, I will not hit you back, because I promised mother I would never strike a playmate, but (kicking him in the stomach) how do you like that?

An Old-Fashioned Girl.

"I've been watching an 'old fashioned girl' for quite a long while," says a writer in the Fitchburg Sentinel, "and I want to tell you something about her.

"Her dresses, etc., were made in modern style; but, bless you, she is so old-fashioned that she arose in the morning when her mother did, helped set the table neatly, and cooked one or two dishes daintily her own self.

"She had 'graduated,' yet she did not think because of that fact that the kitchen was not good enough for her. Oh, no. She was so much behind the times that she actually washed the dishes, made her bed, dusted, and then began preparation for the pudding for dinner. Now, wasn't she absurd, when she (following the accustomed rut) should have been lying on the sofa, with the latest novel in her hand, and her pug dog beside her? When her little brother came in crying because his kite was broken, instead of calling him a 'horrid boy,' as it is the 'fashion' to do in some homes, she helped with her own hands to mend it. How could she be in such a small business?

"After dinner had been cleared away, she produced a small work-basket, and proceeded to mend the family stockings. Shocking! After her task was completed, she accompanied her mother on a shopping expedition; and, although she met many fine-looking gentlemen, she did not flirt with any of them, for, don't you know, she was so antiquated she would have been shocked at the idea. As if it was not elevating to the intellect to be on the watch for some masculine person to fascinate!

"The girl of whom I am telling you was pretty looking, with a bright, fresh color in her face, brought on by plenty of exercise in the open air and in the kitchen. But I cannot begin to tell you half this queer girl did; for, you know, she was so old fashioned that she did whatever good deed came into her heart to do, and her heart was such an antique affair that only pure, noble thoughts entered it. Her home was made bright and sunny by her presence, and yet she was not so perfect that she 'died young.' Oh, no. She lives to day, a girl who has 'no secrets' from her mother."

Chicago girls should be large minded. They have great understandings.

It is no wonder college men become fast. They indulge in a rush so often.

Building a stone house is a sign of wealth. It shows that the builder has lots of rocks.

A fact Just Discovered—"What is Dom Pedro's surname, John?" asked Mrs. Cumso. "McGinty!" replied Cumso, promptly.

In discussing lager beer, a German critic declares that there is in the German vocabulary "no such word as lager." It is not necessary. All he has to do when he wants a couple of schooners is to hold up two fingers and ignore the aforesaid vocabulary entirely.

"Gub bordig, Boggs!" "Hello, Jones! How do you happen to have your head plugged that way?" "Bad code." "Yes, I see; I never get anything like that, though." "How do you beround id?" "I am a horseman, you know, and understand how to break a cold."

Vestibule Train Wrecked.

What is said by some to be the most terrible accident which ever occurred on the Ches & Ohio Railway took place at 7:20 o'clock on Saturday morning, Dec 28th, 1889, about two miles west of the Greenbrier White Sulphur Springs, W. Va. The west-bound Vestibule train, known as the "Fast Flying Virginian," ran off the track at that point, wrecking six of the eight cars, killing ten persons and injuring about 25 others.

The complete list of killed are:

Hale Morrison, Charleston, mail agent, aged 28, top of head and face crushed.

J. W. Thomas, newsboy, Lexington, Ky., left leg broken above and below knee and head injured.

O. B. Barksdale, Profit, Va., baggage-master, head mashed.

J. B. West, Howardsville, Va.; engineer, neck broken.

E. Wilson, Caldwell, Kan., head mashed; had $1.000 in mortgages in his pocket.

Nelson Heath, colored, Claremont, W. Va. head mashed.

H. Faltka, Grant county, South Dakota, both legs broken and head crushed.

Edward Brown, colored, Allegheny, Pa., right leg broken and head mashed.

Kidder Kidd, Hannibal, Mo., mouth full of mud; died of strangulation. He was a member of the Knights of Pythias, and his remains were sent home by No. 1 by order of H. W. Fuller, general manager of the road.

Unknown white man, tall and slender, fair complexion, gray eyes, sandy moustache, dressed in dark brown plaid.

Among the injured are J. R. Karesch, Blackstone, Kan., injured internally; Conductor Schweickert, Huntington, W. Va., leg broken; R. L. Blanton, Farmville, Va., cut under eye; Gus. H. Kline, Chicago, leg broken; Wm. Dell, New York, leg broken; W. Clarke, Clifton Forge, Va., leg broken; P. P. Bunch, back hurt; Wm. Dell, New York city, compound fracture of the thigh; Gustave——, 14 Hooge avenue, Chicago; both these are members of the Charles A. Gardner Artificial Company, and were to play to Charleston at night; J. A. Clark, train dispatcher, Clifton Forge, Va.; John Woodfolk, Alleghany, Va., section hand, right leg crushed, had to be amputated; W. D. Clarke, Nelson county, Va., scalp wound; Louis Karseth, Blackstone, Kan., collar-bone broken; H. F. Gregory, Cliff Top, Va., arm crushed, internally injured; Captain Burch, supervisor, bruised on right side and otherwise hurt.

The train was running at a fast rate. The conductor says it was only running 35 miles, others say 40 or 50. All of the killed were in the smoking car, which was telescoped by another car. Every person in the car was killed except the conductor, who had his leg broken. He will probably recover.

The dead were taken to Ronceverte, 11 miles distant from the scene of the wreck.

D. W. P. Caldwell, was the first physician who repaired to the scene of the accident and did all in his power to alleviate the suffering, but could only aid one person at a time. After some time a number of doctors from along the line arrived and worked faithfully among the suffering. Ladies turned out in haste, and too much cannot be said in the praise of their noble efforts. The cause of the accident is not definitely known. One report says it was due to the spreading of the rails, while other reports say that the rail was worn out and the ties rotten. The locomotive did not leave the track but passed over the defective spot safely.

The body of Hale Morrison, the mail agent, was brought to Charleston Sunday morning and buried that evening. He was on his last trip before laying off for two weeks' vacation, was 28 years of age, was for several years the supporter of an aged father and mother, and had been in the mail service about ten years. When the republican Administration came in, he expected to lose his position, but instead was promoted for efficiency. He was one of the best men on the road.

If, as distinctly stated by those competent to judge, the spreading of the rails which caused the accident was due to rotten ties, the R. R. Company has been guilty of a criminal negligence for which they should be made to suffer heavily.

Eighteen hundred and eighty, nine has a terrible record of floods fires and other events.

—Attorneys H. S. Rucker, L. M. McClintic and F. J. Snyder, and Justice Grose were down at Academy last Friday and Saturday holding Justice's Court.

—Cards are out announcing the marriage of Miss Mary Curry, of this place to Mr. J. C. McNeel of Academy, on next Wednesday Jan. 15th at 6 o'clock p. m. at the residence of the bride's father.

—J. F. Hull, Esq., of the firm of W. C. Hull & Son, of Edray, and Mrs. W. H. Cleek, of Knapp's creek were visiting friends and relatives in Highland and Bath Co's, last week.

—The only Christmas tree in town was the one in the reception room of Attorney H. S. Rucker given for his family, which was beautifully decorated and ladened with handsome and costly gifts.

—A few invited guests of which we were one of the lucky, partook of a beautiful and apetising supper at the residence of Mr. Henry Sharp on Douthard's creek Friday after Christmas.

—A colored man from down about Academy went to Mt. Grove Tuesday evening before Christmas and bought 3 gallons of liquor, which was stolen from him while passing through Huntersville on his return.

—The Hamilton land situate at the upper end of this County which was advertised in THE TIMES to be sold at Beverly, Randolph Co., on the 3rd inst. was purchased by Col. John Driscol for $6,500

—From all appearances and if Rumor is true Wm. A. Greaver, of Letcher, Bath Co., Va., will be married soon, to one of the fair ones of that vicinity. Any one that knows Will and see him riding by on a mule cannot mistake that he wants to get married, and that bad.

—Dame Rumor says that Mr. G. A. Gwinn, of Bath Co., Va., is very much in love, which is the first time in his lifetime of about 38 years, with one of the fair ones of near Green Bank, and it will not be a surprise to his friends if cards are out announcing his marriage in the near future.

—The unusually quiet village of Edray, was astir not long since, caused by the wild and unaccountable conduct of County Surveyor Baxter; but when it was ascertained that a fine girl had come to the home of Mr. Baxter, they ceased to wonder at his unusual excitement, and now the survey goes on.

—More new subscribers this week.

—The Methodist Quarterly meeting will not commence here next Sunday as was expected.

—Dick Knapp, very mysteriously disappeared from his home near Edray a few weeks ago, and a short time after, was reported as being found dead in the woods; when a coroners jury was summoned and repaired to the scene, it was found to be only a paddy with Dick's clothes. Very conflicting reports have been circulated as to Dick's where' bouts, and it is believed by some that he has really been killed, though no apparent motive can be assigned.

"Business is Business."

There lives in the city of New York a man who has accumulated quite a fortune by simply advising people what to do. There always will be a large number of persons who are unable to rely on their own judgment; others come to conclusions with ease and certainty.

A young man had accumulated a thousand dollars, and was debating whether he should buy a small candy store with it, or whether he should lend it on a mortgage. This latter he knew was the secure way; the other promised great profits. In this perplexity he saw an advertisement: "Advice given to those going into business."

After stating his case, the counsellor said, "My fee will be five dollars in advance."

When this was paid he asked:

"Do you understand the candy business?"

"No; I did not think it was necessary. I expect to supervise it merely."

"Then you will lose all your money in three months."

"You think I had better lend the money on the mortgage?"

"I do not say that. What is your business; that is, what do you perfectly understand?"

I know the pickle business through and through. I can make pickles of all kinds, but I do not like it."

"Never mind what you like. Go and get a small place and make pickles; go from hotel to hotel, restaurant to restaurant, and sell them. In ten years come back and see me; you will have ten thousand dollars at least."

As the young man was going away he was called back.

"Here is a card; I want you to put it where you can see it a hundred times a day." These were the words on the card: "Business is business. Men don't do what they like; they do what they can."

The card had a strange fascination for him; he read it with care, as he walked along the street. As he studied it, new light seemed to enter his mind.

He found a dingy basement, and began to arrange for his operations. Of course vinegar must be got, several barrels of it; some was offered him at ten cents a gallon, some more was shown at five cents. Which shall I take?" He thought of the words on his card. He seemed to see people tasting his pickles, and, not liking them, depart without buying. "They will know good vinegar," thought he, and so he bought the honest stuff.

In a few days several tubs of materials were ready, and he knew he must market them. Now he greatly dreaded to face strange people, and push his goods upon their notice; he never had courage when a boy, and now as a young man he felt more timid, it seemed. But he thought of the words of the card, and entered a restaurant. The [illegible] manager was a blooming young woman, and the pickle dealer was more afraid of women than men. But "business is business" repeated itself over and over in his mind.

The answer to his statement was that his pickles would be tried, and if found all right would be purchased.

"Glad I got that good vinegar," thought the young man; and he began to feel that there was a certain power in the maxim his adviser had given. He began to feel a courage he had never expected in meeting people and trying to sell his goods to them.

Calling at a store to get, if possible, an order for pickles in bottles, he was quickly and rudely met with "Don't want to see any such stuff." Noticing the utter dismay on the young man's face, the merchant said short and sharp, "Don't you know enough of business to put up your goods attractively?"

As he retreated, ruffled and disheartened the maxim repeated itself over and over with this additional sentence. "It is business to to put up goods attractively." He sought out a lithographer, and had some handsomely colored labels printed. "They will buy the bottles said a friend, "just for the picture you have on them."

When he had gained sufficient courage he sought out again the merchant who had rebuffed him. "I have come to make you a present of a bottle of fine pickles."

"Why do you make me a present of them?"

"Because you gave me advice that is worth a great deal."

The morning of one Fourth of July came, and he pondered whether to go to his store or not. All at once, he thought, people going on picnics will want pickles; it was the magic words on the little card that ran through his mind. He found, as he had thought, a large number of buyers waiting for him.

The little card was consulted in all sorts of weather. If a man made a proposition to him of any kind, and he was in doubt, he would go and look at the words, though he knew them by heart already. One day a cheese merchant came to persuade him to buy his stock.

"People," said he, who buy pickles, always buy cheese; you will do a big trade." It was a temptation. He went and looked at the words, and studied them intently; trying to think out their application to the case in hand. "Men do what they can;" he reflected. "I would like to sell cheese, but I know I can sell pickles;" then he returned. Now he was resolute and firm, although by nature easily bent and swayed by the words of others.

"Business is business," he said. "I am in the pickle business: if I cannot make money in this, I shall quit and go into something else; but I will not have two kinds on my hands."

It was a turning point; after this he could refuse all influence to go into something that seemed at the time more lucrative. He was not only industrious, it is plain, he had a fixed principle of action. Of course he was successful; all men who put industry and mind to their work are bound to be successful. When the ten years were up, of course he had the ten thousand dollars, and more, too.—Treasure Trove.

HER ROMANCE.

She was a carpet-weaver who lived in a flourishing Indiana town. For years she had been a widow, yet she was not yet what is called "middle aged," and was good looking and intelligent. Patiently and cheerfully she sat at her loom day after day, until at last she was able to buy a snug little cottage, with vines clambering about the latticed porch and a pretty green yard in front.

She moved in and fitted up the house tastefully, inside and out. Carpet of her own weaving covered the floors, and every aid to comfort and beauty which her modest purse could buy was added. It was a sweet and home-like place, the neighbors said, and one and all liked to look at it as they passed and nod to the pleasant faced widow as she sat on her porch on a summer evening after the day's weaving was done.

Ever since she had been a carpet weaver "Jolly John's" express wagon had delivered her goods. "Jolly John's" was old, bluff, lame and ill-tempered, but exceedingly honest; and so the widow bore patiently with his disobliging ways and uncivil manners, because she was sure that after much growling and blustering he would do what he undertook to do exactly right. Sarcasm had fastened his nickname to him, because he and jollity were total strangers.

One day when the carpet weaver sent for Jolly John's wagon it arrived without Jolly John. The figure that sat on the driver's seat was very unlike Jolly John's. Straight, strong and handsome, this man adorned the situation and he had a tongue which, like that of Richard III., "could wheedle with the devil." This and his graceful manners made a favorable impression on the widow at once. He was a skillful dog, too, and managed to combine gallantry and business so well that after he was gone the carpet-weaver mentally named him "Handsome Henry," as she read the brand new business card he had given her while he explained that he had bought out Jolly John's business, root and branch.

Handsome Henry proved as capable in business as he was fascinating in manner. It was no time until the widow began to look for his coming with a new light in her eye; and always after he drove away a rosy flush dyed her cheeks. Soon the neighbors remarked that she rarely sat alone on the porch now. The good-looking expressman was almost always with her after the work of the day was over; and his face was as bright and sunny as hers.

In a little while he begged her to marry him and make him happy and she consented.

And so they were married and got on beautifully together. The neighbors often spoke of the harmony of the expressman's household. "Here are a husband and wife who really love each other," they said. Nevertheless they probed the situation for weak places, as neighbors will, and discovered a difference in the degree of the love of "Handsome Henry" and his wife. They said the woman's love was stronger, and that the man knew it and would trade upon it and finally get the upper hand of her.

It was true that she loved him over much. For years her life had been bitterly lonely and destitute of the sweetness of affection. This made her grateful and glad for her present blessings all the time. She never looked at her new husband without a smile of satisfaction. At times she even marveled at her happiness and wondered humbly why she had been so blessed when many other women were left uncomfortable and alone.

All went well with the married lovers for a time. But the wife fell ill—very ill. Then the husband spoke plainly of what he had often hinted at before—having his wife's property put in his name. (The neighbors always said he had had his eye on the house when he married her.)

"No," she said. "I will keep it in my own name—I have earned it; but you shall share it with me as long as we both live."

That did not suit him. He wanted it made his unmistakably, "in case any thing should happen."

"If you mean in case I should die," she said, "it is unnecessary. I shall not die."

He insisted, but she was firm. Then he threatened her. If she could not do him that little kindness he would leave her. Yes, that he would.

She loved him devotedly, and this threat, so cruel and unprovoked, wounded and terrified her. And she was so ill that she had not her usual courage. She wept, entreated and begged him not to leave—not while she was ill, at least. Seeing that he had struck the weak string in her heart, the coward played upon it. There was but one thing that would keep him, he told her, and that [illegible] erty [illegible] In sp[illegible] wom[illegible] and [illegible] yield[illegible] Th[illegible] as g[illegible] For [illegible] thought she would finally give it all up and tell him he was her "dear old boy," and that she was "glad to have him back."

The strong arm of the law arrived, clad in blue and brass, and arrived with a bludgeon, and gently but firmly led this recalcitrant "natural protector" out into the bitter world.

Next day the now miserable exile came back with a freshly-oiled tongue and undertook to reinstate himself in his wife's affections. Vain hope. The policeman broke rudely in upon his manly eloquence and took him out again reminding him that the next time he entered the house he (the policeman) would lock him up.

The neighbors acknowledged themselves astonished at the carpet weaver's firmness. They were astounded when, a few days later, she had a relapse and, died, after making a will which cut her husband off without a shilling and left all her property to a cousin. As she lived in Indiana, which has the most liberal laws for women, she could do this and know that her will would stand undisputed.

The expressman put crape on his hat—he was in mourning for his selfishness and folly, the neighbors said.

Strange faces look out of the windows of the carpet-weaver's house as the expressman drives by in his green wagon. "He has had his lesson," the neighbors say. He sighs and wishes he had required [illegible]

Now and then one of the young men employed in the office is found dead in his chair, and the coroner always attributes it to apoplexy.

The infant King of Spain, is lying at the point of death.

A storm in Brooklyn, N. Y. caused the wall of a church to fall, killing five persons.

Judge G. A. Edwards, editor of the Weston Democrat died on the 4th inst, aged 56 years.

The new dwelling house of Mr. G. L. Dunn near Peterstown Monroe Co., was entirely destroyed by fire on the 1st inst. Loss about $2,000, no insurance.

Claud Galaspal aged 17 years was shot and killed by C. T. Lark a lad of 13 years, on Glady Fork, Randolph Co. The lads were out hunting, and the shooting is supposed to be accidental.

William States

Embezzlement can be ranked among the industries specially active during 1889.

The grand total of money embezzled from corporations, private firms or the United States Government was $8,562,763. This is more than half the amount required to run the United States navy for a year, and would keep the War Department going for three months.

The largest sum taken was $1,600,000, which a Chicago man got away with, while there were 23 embezzlements where the loot ranged in amount from $100,000 to $700,000.

The summer dull season furnished the smallest month's operations in this line, those for June being only $87,566, while March showed the heaviest business, $1,181,689.

Of the 294 embezzlements involving $1,000 or upwards, there were 19 committed by private bankers, bank officials and clerks, involving a total sum of $950,000.

The crime was confined to no special class of men, as we find in the list one preacher, one deacon, one United States Consul, one treasurer of college, one printer and a fair sprinkling of salesmen, bookkeepers clerks and others temporarily or regularly entrusted with other peoples money.

The list is an ugly one, and shows some increase in this kind of dishonesty, but no greater than could be expected from the rapid growth of our population and in the opportunities afforded for the work.—Ex.

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, January, 10.—The World's Fair question will probably soon be settled now. St. Louis and Washington have been heard by the Senate committee, and to-morrow will be devoted to hearing arguments in favor of Chicago and New York. In the House the committee on Foreign Affairs which has charge of the matter, has decided to report a bill leaving the site blank, to be filled by vote of the House. If no hitch occurs the whole thing should be settled before the first of February.

Tobacco and silk growers and manufacturers have been trying to impress their views upon the House committee on Ways and Means, and very diverse views they were too.

Representative Cannon, of Illinois, one of the republican members of the Committee on Rules, refuses to sanction the radical departure proposed by Speaker Reed, and no Rules have been as yet reported to the House, which remains completely in the Speakers power, as long as he can get a bare majority to sustain his rulings no matter how outrageous they may be. This was fully demonstrated this week when the Speaker ruled in favor of taking up the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Mr. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, appealed from the ruling and there was an all day fight, the democrats being ably led by Ex-Speaker Carlisle, who made a strong speech in which he tried to shame the republicans into respecting the rights of the minority, but it was no use, they voted to sustain the Speaker's decision. As long as things remain as they are now the republicans have everything their own way in the House, and the only satisfaction the democrats have is that they are setting up a precedent that will be used for all its worth when the democrats again get control in the House.

One of the new democratic Senators from Montana, Martin Maginnis would be certain of obtaining his seat if the Washington newspaper men had to decide the question.

Lawyers on the Senate Finance committee say that Senator Sherman's anti trust bill is unconstitutional.

Senator Morgan delivered a speech in favor of his bill for sending the negroes to Africa, but his bill will not become a law.

—Weak eyes and inflamed lids indicate an impure condition of the blood. The best remedy is Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It vitalizes the blood, regulates the secretions, and expels all scrofulous humors from the system. Try it. Price $1. Worth $5 a bottle.

—The County Court have decided to move the bridge across Knapp's creek at this place, up the creek a little farther, which will be at a point across the creek about the lower end of Mr. Wm. Curry's meadows. This will necessitate two abutments to be built on either side of the creek, and a road to be made through Mr. Curry's meadows on this side to this place, and one through the Aunt Betsy McGloughlin farm on the other side.

Buckeye News.

There is said to be several cases of La Grippe in our neighborhood.

Mr. N. C. McNeill, the promising young lawyer of our neighborhood, was taken ill a few days ago while discharging his duties in the school room and had to be taken home on a horse, where he has been confined to his bed ever since, but is better at this writing. His sickness is heart trouble.

Mr. John Weiford who has been very sick for some time past was able to attend church last Sunday.

Last Saturday was a lively day for Buckeye. The dispute between Dorman, Asbery and others, about a certain land trade was submitted to a board of Arbitrators, who decided that the original contract and agreement should be fulfilled. The streets of our little town were crowded all day with anxious spectators to hear the argument of the case by Mr. J. H. McNeill who it is reported acted as Attorney for all three of the parties interested.

Although it is rather early in the season for duck hunting, two young men of this vicinity left here a few mornings ago in their little boat expecting to duck hunt through to Ronceverte, but at the end of two days they found themselves just opposite Falling Springs. Here they abandoned their boat, as it seems the Greenbrier River had become by this time moving able only for boats (as one paddled the boat while the other looked for ducks). They hunted [illegible] ducks from this on instead of river ducks, we have not heard whether they were caught or killed any ducks.

THE PADDY MYSTERY.

Edray News.

Very nearly a hundred people attended the investigation, held by Justice Barlow at Edray, on Saturday, the 11th inst., in relation to the mysterious disappearance of one Dick Knapp "and the Coroner's Jury Paddy." Upon the examination of a number of witnesses, it was pretty well demonstrated that there had been foul play, and that Dick had been put out of the way. Further developments are anxiously looked for, as the whole country is aroused, and further investigation will be made. The Justice failed to find who was the author of the Paddy Joke. On the 12th inst between fifty and sixty men spent the day searching over Marlin's mountain for some sign or indication, as to whether Knapp, could be found, but failed, so far as we know, to find much, except that at one place near a rough laurel hollow, quite a stench was smelled by some of the men, this place was examined partially, further investigation will be made. The famous bee tree was found, and the whole section searched, but little sign was found. It is now surmised that if Knapp was killed, that his body was taken to the river and sunk. More is known about this affair than has as yet been made public, and it is likely that other disclosures will soon be heard. It is strange that some parties keep out of sight.

The La Grippe is taking hold of a number of our people in earnest.

A Boy Who Recommended Himself.

John Brent was trimming his hedge, and the "snip-snap" of his shears was a pleasing sound to his ears. In the rear of him stretched a wide, smoothly kept lawn, in the centre of which stood his residence, a handsome, massive, modern structure, which had cost him not less than ninety thousand dollars.

The owner of it was the man who, in shabby attire, was trimming his hedge. "A close, stingy old skinflint, I'll warrant," some boy is ready to say.

No, he wasn't. He trimmed his own hedge for recreation, as he was a man of sedentary habits. His shabby clothes were his working clothes, while those which he wore on other occasions were both neat and expensive; indeed, he was very particular even about what are known as the minor appointments of dress.

Instead of being stingy, he was exceedingly liberal. He was always contributing to benevolent enterprises, and helping deserving people, often when they had not asked his help.

Just beyond the hedge was the public sidewalk, and two boys stopped opposite to where he was at work, he on one side of the hedge and they on the other.

"Hellos, Fred! That's a very handsome tennis racquet," one of them said. "You paid about seven dollars for it, didn't you?"

"Only six, Charlie," was the reply.

"Your old one is in prime order yet. What will you take for it?"

"I sold it to Willie Robbins for for one dollar and a half," replied Fred.

"Well, now, that was silly," declared Charlie. "I'd have given you three dollars for it."

"You are too late," replied Fred. "I have promised it to Willie."

"Oh, you only promised it to him, eh? And he's simply promised to pay for it, I suppose? I'll give you three dollars cash for it."

"I can't do it, Charlie."

"You can if you want to. A dollar and a half more isn't to be sneezed at."

"Of course not," admitted Fred; "and I'd like to have it, only I promised the racquet to Willie."

"But you are not bound to keep your promise. You are at liberty to take more for it. Tell him that I offered you another time as much, and that will settle it."

"No, Charlie," gravely replied the other boy, "that will not settle it—neither with Willie nor with me. I cannot disappoint him. A bargain is a bargain. The racquet is his, even if it hasn't been delivered."

"Oh, let him have it," retorted Charlie, angrily. "Fred Fenton, I will not say that you are a champ, but I'll predict that you'll never make a successful business man. You are too punctilious."

John Brent overheard the conversation, and he stopped to a gap in the hedge, in order to get a look at the boy who had such a high regard for his word.

"The lad has a good face, and is made of the right sort of stuff," was the millionaire's mental comment. "He places a proper value upon his integrity, and he will succeed in business because he is punctilious."

The next day, while he was again working on his hedge, John Brent overhead another conversation. Fred Fenton was again a participant in it.

"Fred, let us go over to the circus lot," the other boy said. "The men are putting up the tents for the afternoon performance."

"No, Joe; I'd rather not," Fred said.

"But why?"

"On account of the profanity. One never hears anything good on such occasions, and I would advise you not to go. My mother would not want me to go."

"Did she say you shouldn't?"

"No, Joe."

"Then, let us go. You will not be disobeying her orders."

"But I will be disobeying her wishes," insisted Fred. "No, I'll not go."

"That is another good point in that boy," thought John Brent. "A boy who respects his mother's wishes very rarely goes wrong."

"Two months later, John Brent advertised for a clerk in his factory, and there were at least a dozen applicants.

"I can simply take your names and residences this morning," he said. "I'll make inquiries about you, and notify the one whom I conclude to select."

Three of the boys gave their names and residences.

"What is your name?" he asked, as he glanced at the fourth boy.

"Fred Fenton, sir," was the reply.

John Brent remembered the name and the boy. He looked at him keenly, a pleased smile crossing his face.

"You can stay," he said. "I've been suited sooner than I expected to e," he added, looking at the other boys and dismissing them with a wave of his hand.

"Why did you take me?" asked Fred, in surprise. "Why were inquiries not necessary in my case? You do not know me."

"I know you better than you think I do," John Brent said, with a significant smile.

"But I offered you no recommendations," suggested Fred.

"My boy, it wasn't necessary," replied John Brent. "I overheard you recommend yourself."

But, as he felt disposed to enlighten Fred, he told him about the two conversations he had overheard.

Now, boys, this is a true story, and there is a moral in it. You are more frequently observed, and heard and overheard, than you are aware of. Your elders have a habit of making an estimate of your moral and mental worth. You cannot keep late hours, lounge on the corners, visit low places of amusement, smoke cigarettes and chaff boys, who are better than you are, without older people making a note of your bad habits.

How much more forcibly and creditable pure speech, good breeding, honest purposes, and parental respect would speak in your behalf!

TWO LESSONS.

BY S. D. BARNES.

"It won't do to bet on another man's game," remarked one of the group gathered around the fire in Dutch John's grocery. "I learned that years ago, and the fellow that cut my eye-teeth for me was the same Ab Skinner who was elected to the last Legislature from Rawhide County.

We sat and smoked in silence. We were all old acquaintance of the speaker, and knew that there was a story forthcoming, and it would be related without any urging from us.

"I met Ab first the winter I came down from the North," continued the narrator, after a slight pause. "We were both young fellows, then—I was visiting at Uncle Dick Scofield's ranch, and Ab was one of the cowboys—and we two were together a good deal, hunting and knocking around, and all our spare time we put in playing cards and shaking dice.

"Ab was a fair player, but I was fresh from Chicago, and up to all the dodges of a professional; and gradually I pocketed all the loose change that he could rake and scra e; until finally, I got him down to bedrock, and had to hold up until Uncle Dick paid him his next quarter's salary. Then I fully intended to wade in and gobble the entire hundred and fifty, and pull back for civilization.

"It was a pretty scheme, but somehow it failed to work. Ab Skinner was doing a little scheming at the same time, and his brain, was clearer than mine,

"A week before pay-day, he went over to the 'circle bar' ranch, and when he came back I saw that he had been drinking, and was as happy as a wolf in a sheep pen; but he simmered down again, and so things rocked on for a few days longer.

"We had just moved our cattle in from the upper range and throwed 'em in on a little valley west of the shanty, where not a blade of grass had been nipped all summer long, and there they were feeding—four thousand head of 'em, and as wild a lot as ever waved a horn in a stampede. O e day, about noon, as Uncle Dich was coming in from town, the whole herd lit out after him, crippled his horse, and nearly scared the old man to death.

"'Them cattle are terrors,' he said, as he slid off his horse, and spread himself out on the veranda, when Ab and I were talking to the Deputy Sheriff, who was down looking up some stolen stock—'I thought ol' Dick was a gone coon, sure.'

"'They didn't like your looks,' said Ab with a laugh. 'You couldn't git 'em to run a genuine cowboy. I'll bet I could walk clean across to that knot yander,' and he indicated a little hill entirely beyond the herd; 'walk over, understand, afoot, and alone, and never get a scratch from a horn or hoof.'

"'I would like to bet you something on that,' said I; and I had hardly spoken the words before Ab drew a buckskin bag from his pocket, and shook out a pile of silver and gold.

"'There is fifty dollars,' said he. 'If you want to make some money easy here's your chance. The Sheriff will hold the stakes.'

"Fifty dollars was just the size of my pile, and Ab knew it. I was positive that if Skinner made a break out in that prairie, one of these old Spanish steers would run him down in three minutes; but still I hesitated.

"'Stick him, Charley,' said Uncle Dick; 'the dad-blamed fool will be killed, but that ain't your lookout. If you don't bet, I will!'

"I went over and handed Sheriff Smith the money, and as he put it in his hat along with Ab's fifty, the old man chipped in again.

"'Bein' as you're throwin' away your money, Ab, why not give me some of it? Thar's that hundred and fifty I was goin' to pay you to-night—suppose I put it in the hat with as much more, an if you get through to the knot, Smith kin ride over an' give you the hull wad.'

"'Good enuff,' replied Ab, and in three minutes the Sheriff's old sombrero was looking like a second edition of the national treasury.

"'Le's understand this thing,' said Smith. 'Ab lights out afoot, right now, and goes straight to the knot, and if he gits thar' the dust is his; is that right?'

"'An' if he gits the hull side of his head horned off, or anything like that happens tew him, he don't git it,' said uncle. 'Shake hands, Ab, before you go. You've bin a mighty good hand with the cattle, but I'll be yow'rful glad to assisf at your funeral.'

"'Give me a good one, old man,' grinned Ab, as he jumped off the veranda and started for the knot.

"'Come back,' said Uncle Dick. 'If you'll forfeit one-third, and own you're a fool, we'll let you off.'

"But Ab went ahead as though he had never heard him.

"The wind was blowing straight to the herd, and though the nearest steer was three hundred yards away, he seemed to scent the fun at once; for he throwed up his head with a snort, walked out a few yards meeting Ab, and then, as he saw that his victim was coming directly toward him, the long-horn braced himself, and waited for his arrival. In two seconds, another big, red fellow trotted up, and took his position alongside; and then another, until there was a wall of white horns, fifty yards long, barring Ab's road to the mound, and hundreds of cattle coming in every direction to take a hand in the frolic. A man afoot was a curiosity to them, with which they were evidently bound to become acquainted, if possible.

"'They'll kill him in a holy minnit', muttered Uncle Dick Scofield. 'It'll be another sad gatherin' of friends around the cigar box that holds his remains. I tell ye, Smith, human life is ter'ble unsartin.'

"'Ab Skinner's haint,' replied the Sheriff. 'He's the luckiest feller in forty-three States. I don't see how he's going ter make it, but he'll come out somehow.'

"Just then we saw Skinner stop and put his hand in his pocket. He had approached within sixty yards of the herd, and every hoof was watching him, with a general head shaking, and bellowing, that would have frightened a common man into fits.

"'He's gittin' his gun,' said uncle. 'Mebby he thinks he kin bluff 'em with a little shootin', but he'll miss it, an' if he kin kill two hundred dollars worth at six dollars a head I'll try ter stand it.'

"But Ab did not intend to shoot. He had dropped out of sight in the tall grass, and as we were wondering what it all meant, we saw a tongue of flame leap up in the air and rapidly spread, with the wind fanning it in the direction of the cattle at race-horse speed. Then the bellowing and scraping ceased, the wall of gleaming horns fronted in the other direction, and the whole herd made a break for the bare hills, while Ab stepped in behind the blaze and followed.

"The smoke settled in the little valley and hid everything from view, and I, for one, was quite satisfied that it should be so.

There was no danger to be apprehended from the fire—for the ranch was protected by a stream that the blaze could not cross with the wind against it—but I knew that my fifty dollars was gone, and I felt as sour as vinegar.

"Uncle was feeling no better. He seemed to be paralyzed, and never made a kick about the fire ruining his range; and when three pistol shots from the knot notified us that Skinner had got through, he looked as though he had been sentenced to the 'pen' for life.

"The money is Ab Skinner's', said Smith, and we knew if we kicked we would have the Sheriff to kill, and not only him, but all four of his brothers; and they were all bad men.

"Tell him not to come back," said uncle, savagely, as Smith got on his horse, to deliver the stakes according to agreement. 'Ab is a good fellow, but he is too allfired smart. He would own the ranch in less'n a week.'"

"So! Dot vos der vay of it," put in Dutch John, soberly. "He gets your money already, eh! Dot vos goot—I vos glad of dot."

"And that wasn't the worst of it," went on Charley. "If the matter had stopped there I wouldn't have minded it so much. But you see, uncle and I tried to get even, and that made the business worse.

"I sent home for some money and only got a twenty; but by hustling pretty lively, and striking all the boys for loans, I managed to raise twenty more, and laid my plans to start north at once. Then, just about that time Uncle Dick sold a bunch of beef cattle to a drover, and I went with him to deliver them at Rawhide City, and there we met Ab Skinner once more.

"If any of you fellows were in Rawhide City in '79, you know what sort of a place it was then. For general, allround meanness, I don't believe that little burg was ever equaled. The worst men in the southwest flocked there by the dozens, and gambling and shooting was the order of the day. The 'Golden Spur Saloon' was the headquarters of the very worst citizens, and not a day passed without a knife or six-shooter being used on some of its customers. There had been a fight there the morning we got into town, and an unoffending spectator killed with a stray bullet The next day the proprietor knocked a Mexican in the head with a wine bottle, and that night two cowboys stood on opposite ends of a billiard table, and exchanged shots with army revolvers.

"'It's the worst hole in the Union,' said Uncle Dick to Ab and me. 'A man's life would be in danger there if he had on a suit of b'iler iron. I agreed with him, but Ab turned up his nose and laughed.

"'They know who to fool with down thar,' he said. 'They're the worst kind of bluffs—the hull crowd of 'em. Why, I'll bet I could go down an' cuss the hull crowd, and get away without a scratch.'

"Uncle Dick nudged me with his elbow and grinned. 'You're gassin', Ab,' he said. 'Talk's cheap, but it takes money to back it.'

"'I've got it,' replied Skinner.

"'Put it up then,' said Uncle, 'or shet up.'"

"'I saw Sheriff Smith in town,' said I. 'Suppose we get him to hold the money.'

"The proposition suited the others, and we found our man and stated the case. Ab was to go to the 'Golden Spur,' and deliberately insult the whole crowd that might be there, from the barkeeper down If he got away unharmed, the money was his; if he was killed, or wounded in the least, the whole sum went to uncle and me. I invested every dollar I had and the old man covered the rest of Ab's money, some two hundred dollars.

"Smith took a stand next door to the saloon where he could see the fun; and uncle and I went inside, and getting behind some whiskey barrels, out of range of the door, waited for Ab to show up. There was a big crowd in the 'Golden Spur'—forty at least; and all of them howling drunk. Every man sported a revolver, and some of them, two, and there was a half-dozen Winchesters stacked in the corner.

"'I reckon we'll get even with Skinner this time,' said I, and Uncle Dick was so tickled with the prospect that he set up the drinks all around.

"Just as the glasses were filled, I heard the tramp of hoofs outside and a horse's head was stuck in at the door; and over and beyond, I caught a glimpse of Ab Skinner and a big double-barrelled shotgun.

"'You know me,' he yelled. 'I am Ab Skinner—a white man and a gentleman—and too good to mix with the drunken, cowardly cutthroats that hang around this ranch. Do you hear me?'

"Yes, they heard him. Six-shooters gleamed all over the room. The proprietor leaped over the bar with a Sharp's carbine in his hand, and Uncle and I hugged the whiskey barrel closer than ever.

"Then two shots were fired—the two barrels of Ab's shot gun—in quick succession, and, as the smoke filled the room, it seemed to me that my eyes had been torn from my head, and I had swallowed a bushel of fire. In the midst of my agony I listened for more shooting, but failed to hear it. Instead the air was filled with coughs and sneezes mixed with loud but broken bursts of profanity. I did not know then, but I learned afterward, that Ab's gun contained, in lieu of shot, about sixteen ounces of snuff and Cayenne pepper, with enough powder behind it to blow it into the room, and scatter it well through the atmosphere. It was a devlish, cruel scheme to work on a fellow, and if the men of the Rawhide City could have caught Skinner that day they would have burnt him at the stake without a dissenting voice.

"A half hour later Uncle Dick and I were down on Rawhide Creek with about forty more tough-looking citizens, washing the snuff and pepper from our eyes, when Deputy Smith strolled up, and tendered us a slip of paper which set forth in Skinner's unmistakable scrawl, that—'The bearer has paid over the money placed in his hands, and will hand you two dollars and fifty cents to be invested in eye-salve and blue goggles.' And that was the last I heard of Ab Skinner until I got the news t'other day of his election to the State Legislature from the same Rawhide County, where he gobbled all of my small change, ruined the prospects of my return North, nearly put out my eyes, and broke me of betting on another man's game.

TRAVELER.

A Railroad for Lewisburg.

The proposed subscription of $15,000 to the Ronceverte, Lewisburg and Cold Knobs Railroad Co. was carried at the election in the town of Lewisburg, last Saturday, Jan. 11th, by an almost unanimous vote, only three or four votes being cast against it. This, according to the agreement with the Messrs. Haines Bros., insures the building of the road, and work will be commenced in the near future.

The grip, or properly speaking the pneumonia, is playing smash with the Democratic majority in the Ohio Legislature. It has carried off three Democratic members already.

A Brilliant Wedding.

The marriage of Miss Mary C. Curry to Mr. Joseph McNeel, took place at the home of the brides parents on last Wednesday evening at 6 o'clock, p. m., with Rev. W. E. Miller, officiating. The bride is a lovely, enchanting, admirable lady, pure and charming, full of unselfish thoughts for others, gentle, gracious and spotless. Not the milk-white and stately lilies are so radient in their stainless candor as such a bride; no trophic blossom vies with her health colered face beaming with the light of the sweet soul within her; such a wife is the flo er and crown of humanity, and cannot be other than the lifelong delight of the luckey young man who won her. While on the other hand the groom is one among the best and most popular young men Pocahontas Co., contains, kind and generous to the last degree.

The attendants were, Miss Maggie Patterson with Mr. Sherman Curry; Miss Lucy Barlow with Mr. Penick Wallace; Miss Otie Cackley with Mr. Harry Moore, and Miss Mary Beard with Mr. Sam McNeel.

The bridal presents were numerous and handsome. After the ceremony and congratulations, the happy couple, with their attendants, and a number of friends partook of a luscious wedding repast. The next day they left for their future home at Academy, where a nice reception awaited them.

THE TIMES predicts for this happy couple a life of bliss and prosperity.

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, January, 17.—Mr. Harrison has if appearances count for anything, taken a step in the nomination of Mr. Clark to be Collector of Customs at Chicago, at the request of Mr. Pullman, the sleeping car millionaire, and in spite of the protest of Senator Farwell openly expresses his determination to defeat the nomination of Clark when it comes before the Senate, and if he can get a few republican votes he is likely to succeed, as he has a claim on the democratic Senators—for help in the confirmation of Chief Justice Fuller—which will give him their votes if he asks for them.

How's this for a new navy? The committe appointed by Secretary Tracy to report plans for a new navy has gone into the business in a way that would soon turn the Treasury surplus into a big deficiency. If it had its way we should build 102 war vessels during the next fourteen years at a cost of $280,000,000. Fortunately for the tax payers of this country, Mr. Tracy's committee has no control over Uncle Sam's cash box.

The seven million acres of land in the Sioux reservation in the Dakotas will soon be opened to settlement. Mr. Harrison's proclamation to that effect has already been written, but has not yet been made public.

The uncertainty about the action of the House committee on Rules continues, and there is a diversity of opinion about it. Some believe that the rumor of Representatives McKinley and Cannon refusing to agree to a number of the radical changes proposed by Speaker Reed is true; others that the delay is simply to leave the House in the Speaker's power, and still others, that the hitch is caused because a number of republicans have refused to vote for any Rules curtailing the rights of the minority, recognizing the fact that two years from now they will belong to the minority. Mr. Carlisle will make no fight in the committee, but when the new Rules are reported to the House, unless they are very different from those proposed by the Speaker, he will fight their adoption in every possible manner.

Speaker Reed will appoint a special committee of the House to have charge of World's Fair matters. Mr. Reed says he intends to arrange the committee so that no one of the rival cities shall have undue advantage.

The fun has begun before the House committee engaged in investigating the Ohio ballot-box forgery. Gov. Campbell and ex Gov. Foraker are to tell the committee what they know about the matter. Murat Halstead also. The last named will probably take advantage of this opportunity to get even with some of his political friends, but personal enemies in the Senate.

McKinley's committee will give no more hearings on the tariff. It will now attempt the difficult feat of bringing the republican members together in the new bill. Sugar will probably be the greatest obstacle to harmony.

Secretary Windom has prepared a bill, which is to be introduced in in the House next week, to carry out the silver ideas contained in his annual message. It is supposed that Mr. Harrison will send a message to Congress, approving the bill, immediately afterwards.

Representative Cummings of N.Y. City, and also of the New York Sun, is something of a wag, but the republicans did not seem to see the humor in the resolution he offered in the House providing foa the erection in the center of the rotunda of the Capitol building of a bronze statue of the late Samuel J. Tilden upon which the following is to be prominently inscribed: "Samuel J. Tilden, nineteenth President of the United States; elected, but not seated."

In Memory.

Mr. Alexander Barlow, departed this life, at his home near Edray, W. Va., at 12 o'clock, on the night of the 13th of January, 1890, at the good old age of 82 years, 1 month and 1 day; being born Dec. 12th, 1807. He died of old age and general decline, the active cause of death being an attack of LaGrippe, which was too hard for his failing strength.

In some respects he was a remarkable man, and especially in a religious point of view. For a great number of years he was a faithful and conscientious member of the M. E. Church, and always without exception, exhibited the most humble and unassuming, christian character; and not only did he show by action and profession, that he loved the Lord, but he was often wonderfully blessed with the Divine Presence, and his demonstrations of delight, on such occasions, proved their Divine character, by the effect produced on others. His public prayers were made in the most simple and plain language, but were often wonderful in their effect. Eternity alone can disclose the result of the influence of his religious character, both among his friends and all his acquaintances. His prayers always seemed to be the language of a child to a kind father; full of faith, and confidence. He has gone to his home in the Heavens. His kindred know where to look for him. Peace to his ashes.

THE DEVIL TO PAY.

When Gutenberg, Coster and Faust first began,
In secret the great art preservative to plan,
The ignorant masses, suspecting some evil,
Traced all of their mysteries right to the devil;
And thus the assistant who tends to the fires,
Who handles the rollers, and washes the same,
By the name of the devil has gone into fame.

As years crept along till they reached modern times,
An occasional printer was short in his dimes,
And once it occurred that an editor found
At the end of the week he' not cash to go round;
He counted and figured to get it all square,
The foreman and comps, must each one have his share;
When he'd got it all fixed, as he thought, in dismay
He discovered and cried: "There's the devil to pay."

So now 'tis a proverb, grown common in years,
When worry or care at the office appears;
When bills can't be met, or when trouble is rife;
When blood-thirsty men seek the editor's life;
When subscribers won't "ante," and ads are shy;
When his "cake is all dough" and his form is all "pi"—
A proverb that comes in the editor's way,
And so he exclaims: "There's the devil to pay."

GETTYSBURG.

I stood to-day upon the ridge
Where gore the blue brigades were massed,
And gazed upon the plain below,
O'er which the charging columns passed.

And sauntering downward, somewhat sad,
Among the stones no longer stained,
I came upon a little mound
That only the front rank had gained;

A little mound left all alone,
Unmarked by flower or cypress wreath
To show that some regretful heart
Remembered him who slept beneath.

But half-way hidden by the grass,
I found a broken barrel stave;
The headboard which some foeman's hand
Had kindly placed upon the grave.

And on it traced these touching words,
In letters I could scarce divine:
"A rebel, name unknown who fell
First in the foremost line."

God's peace be with thee in thy rest,
Lone dweller in the stranger's land,
And may the mold above thy breast
Lie lighter than a sister's hand.

On the other brows let careless fame
Her fadeless wreath of laurel twine,
Enough for thee, thy epitaph:
"First in the foremost line!

KENTUCKY'S PIONEERS.

In the early settlement of Kentucky, the boys and even the women and children, became as thorough soldiers as the men. This was the result of their surroundings. They were educated to it, and lived at a time when it was necessary to practice it daily. There were few women on the frontier but could load and fire a rifle, and many of them could do it with as fatal accuracy as their fathers, husbands and brothers. A fair illustration is found in the case of a Mrs. Daviess whose husband was among the early settlers of Lincoln county. She could shoot an Indian with as steady a hand as Daniel Boone himself. One day a white man came to her husband's cabin who had stolen some property from him, and who bore a bad character generally.

Mrs. Daviess was alone with her children when this desperado called, and, knowing her husband was on the lookout for him, she resolved to capture him. Upon his entering the cabin she asked him if he would not "take a dram"—no pioneer's home was ever found without its whisky bottle, which was kept as a remedy for snake bites, etc. She put the bottle on the table and told him to step up and help himself. He set his gun against the cabin wall to comply with her invitation, and, after a hearty pull at the bottle, he turned to find himself looking into the muzzle of his own rifle, which Mrs. Daviess had picked up while he was drinking, cocked it, and stood with it leveled at his head. When he asked her what she meant, she informed him that he had stolen her husband's property, and she meant to keep him there until his return, and she did. She stood guard over him until her husband's return, when she delivered to him her prisoner.

The boys were no less brave and [illegible]. To fight the "Injuns" was the first thing they learned, and, by the time they could lift a rifle they knew how to use it. Many instances and incidents could be given illustrating the heroism of the border boys, of which the following may be taken as a fair sample: Among the early settlers of Hardin county was one Silas Hart, an expert hunter, a thorough back woodsman, and an inveterate Indian hater and fighter.

On one of their many incursions into his neighborhood, Hart pursued them with a few chosen followers, and before they reached the Ohio shot and killed their chief. The savages vowed vengeance against him and his family, and shortly another incursion was made by them under the leadership of the brother of the fallen chief. As usual, Hart was first on their trial, and the savages retreated toward the Ohio. The whites finally despaired of overtaking them and returned home, when the Indians turned upon their trial and became the pursuers instead of the pursued. Hart reached his home about dark, and, being much fatigued from his long tramp, slept soundly all night, little dreaming of danger lurking near.

Next morning, just as the family were sitting down to breakfast, the savages appeared at the door, and the dead chief's brother shot Hart dead. His son, a lad but twelve years old, sprang up, seized his father's rifle and shot the murderous savage. As the next Indian sprang over his fallen leader, the brave and undaunted boy, with a large hunting knife, stabbed him to the heart. But the odds were against him, and he and his mother were carried away captives. It was the intention of the the savages to take them to their towns and torture them, but they were finally ransomed and returned to their friends.

The same Daviess mentioned above was surprised one morning in August, 1782, by Indians. They had approached his cabin during the night, concealed themselves, and waited for him to make his appearance. Daviess, a little after daylight, got up and stepped out of his cabin. He had proceeded but a short distance from the door when, turning he beheld a number of savages behind him and the cabin. Seeing there was no chance to render his family assistance, he fled to the nearest station which was five miles distant, for help.

The Indians made prisoners of his wife and children, the eldest a boy 12 years old, and, knowing Daviess had escaped, they soon left with their prisoners, hoping to escape beyond the Ohio. Daviess gathered a force, and pursued so rapidly as to overtake them before night. As usual, when about to be brought to bay, the savages essayed to kill their prisoners, but were too closely pressed by the whites. A savage, however, succeeded in knocking down the boy and scalping him. The boy was not killed, only stunned by the blow, and almost as soon as the savage left him bounded to his feet, exclaiming: "Darn that Injun, he's got my scalp."

The boy lived to grow up to manhood, but was ever after, "bald headed"; the hair would grow no more on that part of the head which had been scalped. He never forgave the savages for rendering him prematurely bald headed, but swore eternal vengeance against them. In the summer of 1792, ten years after his experience detailed above, a band of Indians raided the settlement, and stole a number of horses. Young Daviess joined a party in pursuit of them. When the savages found they would be overtaken they ambushed the whites, and in the skirmish that ensued young Daviess was killed. Thus the Indian fatally clung to him.—William Henry Perrin in Louisville Courier Journal.

A Puzzled Witness.

An amusing scene was recently enacted in a country court in Maine. The trial Justice, a big, pompous official, with a voice like a trombone took it upon himself to examine a witness, a little withered old man, whose face was as red and wrinkled as a smoked herring.

"What is your name?" asked the Justice.

"Wy, Squire," said the astonished witness, "you know my name as well as I know yourn."

"Never you mind what I know, or what I don't know," was the caution given with magisterial severity. "I ask the question in my official capacity, and you're bound to answer it under oath."

With a contemptuous snort the witness gave his name, and the questioning proceeded.

"Where do you live?"

"Wal, I swan!" ejaculated the old man. "Well," he continued, appealing to the laughing listeners, "I've lived in this town all my life and so's he," pointing the Justice, "an' b'gosh, to hear him go on you'd think—"

"Silence!" thundered the irate Magistrate. "Answer my question or I'll fine you for contempt of court."

Alarmed by the threat, the witness named his place of residence and the examination went on.

"What is you occupation?"

"Huh?"

"What do you do for a living?"

"Oh, git out, Squire! Jest as if you don't know that I tend gardens in the summer season an' saw wood winters!"

"As a private citizen I do know it, but as the court I know nothing about you," explained the perspiring Justice.

"Wal 'Squire," remarked the puzzled witness, "if you know somethin' outside the court room an' don't know nothin' in it you'd better get out an' let somebody try this case that's got hoss sense."

The advice may have been well meant, but it cost the witness $10.

He Ought to Be A Coroner.

One day, as we were riding through the country back of Natches, we came upon a white man sitting on a log with a swith in his hand, while tied to a tree near by was a colored boy about 15 years old. Naturally enough, we stopped to inquire what it all meant, and the man replied:

"I'm a-tryin' to find out what this 'ere nigger has done with my mewl."

"Nebber seed his mewl!" replied the boy.

"Yes, ye didye lump o'darkness! I'm gwine to give you five minutes mo' fur to tell me, and then I'll put on the switch!"

"Who is he?" asked the colonel.

"Oh, belongs around yere."

"Do you know that he stole your mule?"

"In co'se. That is if he didn't who did?"

"Nebber dun stole his mewl!" protested the boy.

"Shet! Them five minutes is about up!"

"What sort of a mule was it?" asked the colonel.

"Sort o' small and lean and yaller."

"A strap around his neck?"

"Sartin."

"Well, he's lying dead in the ditch two miles down the road."

"Shoo! Dead is he?"

"He is."

"Reckoned he was dead or stole, but wanted to be shore of it. Now, boy, you kin go, but don't you dun git into no sich scrape agin!"

The boy went off with a grin on his face, and we had been talking with the man for about five minutes, when he suddenly jumped clear of the ground and yelled:

"What a bim haw I am, to be shore! Yere I've dun let that nigger make a skip, when I orter put the switch 'till I found out what that 'ere mewl died of!"

On Business.

The Governor of Georgia had just dismissed a delegation of Prohibitionists, when a card bearing the name "Judge J. T. W. Madison" was handed him. The chief executive was very tired, having been harassed with dry speeches, and would have sent down an excuse, but the high sounding name on the card bespoke a visitor of importance; so wearily yielding, he told the porter to show the gentleman up. A few moments later one of the most deeply colored gentlemen in the State stepped into the room.

"Dis yere de gubner?"

"Yes. What do you want?"

"I's called on bizness, sah. I's er jedge down——"

"You are a judge?"

"Yes, Justice o'de Peace down in de swamp districk."

"Well, state your business with me as quickly as you can."

"I'll do it, sah. Case dat's what I come yere fer. Lemme see, now. Oh, yas. Some time ago, sah, I had er man named Sam Bly 'rested an tried for stealin' co'n. I tried him myse'f and fined him four hundred dollars an' six munts in jail. Dis wuz all satisfactory, 'specially ter me, but de blame lawyer he tuck er 'peal ter de circus cou't. Now, sah, my bizness wid you is dis yere: Ef you's got any 'fluence wid de jedge o'dat circus cou't, I wush you'd drap him a few lines an' tell him ter send dat case back ter me. Now, is you got much 'fluence wid dat jedge?"

"You old scoundrel, get out of here or I will have you thrown out."

"Jest wait er minit, sah; jest wait er minit. I know dat nigger stole dat co'n, an' I kno dat he wants ter take er 'peal just so he ken skape de justice dat is after him. Dar's anoder thing: Dat nigger is er mighty p'litical bother down dar an de folks wants ter git rid o'him till arter de leckshun—knows da does, er da wouldn't er promised me er hunnud dollars fer send him up. Now, it's er gubnor's duty ter do what de folks wants him ter do an'—hol' on, hol' on, I'll go. Nebber seek sich times er dese comin' ober folks. Hol' on, fur I'se dun gone."

Wyoming Settler—You didn't see nothin' of Jim Sparks down the road, did yer?

Friend—No.

Wyoming Settler—Jim stole my daughter last night.

Friend—You don't say! Jim always was a goosy one.

Woming Settler—Yes, and he tuk them two hosses of mine.

Friend—The infernal scoundrel!

"You don't have titles in this country I believe?" said the Duke, with a sneering smile.

"Oh, yes, we do," retorted American. "Your grace, for instance, in this country would be known as a D—— Fool."

Leading New York wheat dealers believe that Europe has no other place to draw upon for her supplies than the United States for the next six monts, except the Argentine Republic, which never exported over 8,000,000 bushels.

A newspaper report says that Mr. Clarkson will soon resign his position as Assistant Postmaster-General, as he "only took it for a year, so that he might rid the country of Democratic postmasters and get an inside view into politics." If the above statement is even half true, he ought not to be allowed to resign, but should be kicked out.

In Chemnitz, Germany, weavers of tick get $1.50 per week, fustian weavers $2, sewers $1.25, corsetmakers twenty to twenty-five cent per day. At Bremen male weavers earn from $3 to $3.75 a week, women $1.25 to $2. In Silesia the average falls to twenty nine cents per day. Berlin engineers make from seventy-five cents to $1 per day. Workers in glassware and porcelain make less than seventy cents per day. These figures are from a report of the Chemnitz Chamber of Commerce.

Brushy Run Items.

Not seeing anything in your paper from this part, I will endeavor to give you a few items.

Revs. Hannah and Arbogast, have just closed one of the greatest revivals that has ever been in the upper part of Pocahontas Co. There were 45 conversions and 38 accessions to Methodist Episcopal church and about 12 penitents when the meeting closed.

Miss. Verdie Arbogast, who has been suffering with an attack of Rheumatism, we are glad to know is convalescent.

Attorneys Rucker and McClintic, were in this vicinity taking depositions in the case of Randolph, Shaven against James Grogg and wife.

Our school is flourishing under the management of F. R. Stalnaker. He has 35 pupils enrolled.

Bud Burner and Miss Nora Riley paid this part a flying visit last week.

Peter Grogg who was kicked by an animal a few days ago is slowly recovering.

Miss Nora Holliday is attending school, with the attention of teaching next winter.

Rumor has it that there will be a wedding in this part soon.

Jessie Varner has been visiting at James Grogg.

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON, January, 24.—Speaker Reed is every day showing how unfit he is to occupy his present position, and the republican members of the House are daily whipped into supporting him in his unparliamentary decisions.

The House comittee on Rules met yesterday and the republican members of the committee, against the protest of ex Speaker Carlisle, decided upon a schedule of Rules, to be reported. Mr. Carlisle will make a strong minority report, and will fight the adoption of the Rules by the House in every way possible, but of course if the Speaker persists in deciding everything according to his own sweet will, the democrats stand little show of defeating them, unless some of the conservative repuid cans shall display courage enough to vote against their party. Many of them are known to be opposed to the proposed Rules but whether they have nerve enough to vote as they think, is a question.

The House has passed the Oklahoma townsite bill, after nearly a week spent in debating it in committee of the whole.

Senator Ingalls delivered a characteristic harangue in the Senate yesterday afternoon, alleged to be a reply to Senator Butler's speech in favor of his negro emigration bill. This senatorial spit fire does not mellow with age, but grows more wicked with less temptation. The worst of it is that he cannot be left to stew in his own juice, because he is nothing but skin and bones and veins filled with nitro muriatic acid.

The indications now are that the special House committee on the World's Fair will soon find itself in an interminable dead-lock. The Senate committee does not appear to be getting along much faster. Everybody professes to want to see the matter settled at once, but the prospect of an early settlement is not good.

As was expected the House committee on Elections has, by a strict party vote, reported in favor of unseating Jackson, the democratic sitting member from West Virginia, and giving the seat to Smith, the contesting republican. This is the first of the seventeen contested election cases, and it would not be at all surprising if the republicans of the committee reported in favor of every republican contestant, except Langston, the negro contestant from the Fourth Virginia (Mahone's home). It is understood that Mahone has secured promises enough to beat Langston.

Governor Campbell having been unable to come to Washington this week, the House committee investigating the Ohio ballot box forgeries has postponed the further hearing of witnesses until February 3. The witnesses so far heard made havoc of what little reputation ex-Governor Foraker had.

The civil service Commissioners having stated to the House committee on Reform in the civil service that they desired an investigation, that committe, will next week make a favorable report on the resolution ordering an investigation.

Ex-Speaker Randall has joined the Presbyterian church. His health still keeps him confined to his residence, but he continues hopeful, and expects if he is not able to go to the House, to send a written protest against the adoption of the schedule of Rules prepared by Speaker Reed.

Commissioner of Pensions Raum gives it out flat footed that all the clerks in that office who had their pensions re-rated will be bounced. A chief of division, who was a special protege of Tanner's has already been made to walk the plank.

Mr. and Mrs. Harrison gave a State dinner to the diplomatic corps Tuesday evening. They have made an innovation in White House entertainments by having the dinner furnished by an outside caterer.

Ancient history sometimes crops out in Congress. For instance Senators Pasco and Chandler had a dispute about the famous Florida Returning board of 1876 this week. Mr. Chandler, it will be remembered, was one of the visiting statesmen on that interesting occasion.

Secretary Tracy has ordered a naval court of inquiry to investigate the charges of certain Naval-officers banding together for lobbying purposes, as alleged in a recent Senate resolution.

Ex Secretary Vilas and ex-Commissioner of Pensions Black were in Washington this week,

Advice to Mothers.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used when children are cutting teeth. It relieves the little sufferer at once; it produces natural, quiet sleep, and the little cherub awakes as "bright as a button." It is very pleasant to taste. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, regulates the bowels, and is the best known remedy for diarrhœa, whether arising from teething or other causes. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

NOTICE.—Having been solicited by a goodly number of my old customers to resume the taning business I have consented to do so, hoping all conserned may be benefitted. Respectfully,

"What for?"

"Mall wants to see you."

"Let him want."

"You come on."

"Not much!"

It took two men and a tustle to bring him up, and as he stood panting in the captain's room that officer asked:

"What's the reason you didn't come quietly along?"

"Is it you who wants me?"

"Yes."

"Oh, this fellow said it was a man and I thought he was going to get me up here and yell 'McGinty,' at me."

"My friends," said a temperance lecturer, lowering his voice to an impressive whisper, "if all the grog shops were at the bottom of the sea, what would be the result?" For answer came: "Lots of people would get drowned!"

It is perhaps because there are exceptions to all rules that some persons seem to be able to bid defiance to many of the recognized laws of health.

"Wouldn't you like a little something to eat before you go to bed?" said an old farmer to a guest who was about retiring for the night:

"No, thank you," was the reply. "I never eat anything after supper."

"You don't? Well, I couldn't sleep if I didn't have a little snack of some sort 'fore I went to bed. Of course I don't eat a reg'lar meal, but I feel all the better for a piece of pie, and two or three doughnuts with some cheese and a pickle and a bit of cold pork—some light refreshments, you know, just to stay the stomach."

Mr. Winks—Mr. Editor, Mr. Blinks is dead, but as he and you were not on very good terms I am afraid that you will not give him the obituary notice that he deserves and—

Editor (enthusiastically)—Oh, yes I will. I'll give him the very best send-off I can write, for he was one of nature's noblemen.

Mr. Winks—Well, that's good; but what caused you to praise him so when you know him to be your enemy?

Editor—Because out of two hundred callers at my office during the cold weather of last week, he was the only one that closed the door.

"UP A TREE."

BY E. C. SUTTON, IN "BRITISH WORKMAN."

"Hi, father! Hi! Come alongside here and take me off!"

Farmer Binstead looked up in the direction whence the voice proceeded. It came from one of a line of dismal pollard willow trees, standing in a waste of waters caused by one of the frequent overflows of the "Lazy Ouse."

"Hullos, Dick! Is this you?" he shouted from the boat in which he was rowing his wife and the rest of the family to the village, about a couple of miles away. "Why didn't you come home last night? Ha! I don't want any of your excuses. 'Twas the old game. And now, you see, it's landed you up on a tree with a vengeance. You're out of harm's way there, at any rate; and there you may stop, for aught I care."

"Oh, Dan!" pleaded the mother of the reckless youth, "turn back, do! Don't be so hard upon the lad!"

"Hard upon him, indeed! I should like to know if he's not a deal harder upon us? He's always wasting his time, his brains and his money at the 'Fox and Hounds' yonder, upsetting all the peace of home, and turning our heads white with anxiety and worry before the autumn of our life's begun. He's always up a tree, and never will be anywhere else as long as he lives, unless he changes his bad ways. We're everlastingly helping him out of his scrapes, and that, I reckon, is why he doesn't mind——"

"But Dan—just this once! You surely haven't the heart to leave him there!"

"Tut, tut, Mary! If the fellow's up a tree, the only thing for him to do is to get down again as quickly as he can. Let him help himself for once. The water is not deep enough to drown him, and if it were, Dick can swim; so nothing worse can come of it than a wet skin. It's only right that he should sometimes suffer the penalty he brings upon himself."

"Father, are you coming?"

"No."

"But what am I to do?"

"Whatever suits you best, my boy. Stay where you are till the floods subside, or make the best of your way down and across to the village yonder."

A few rapid passes with the oars and the old-fashioned flat bottomed boat had placed too great a distance between Dick and his belongings to admit of anything further being heard but the splash of the waters and the earnest tones of his mother's voice.

"It's no manner of use your talking, wife," said her husband, firmly. "I don't mean to be unkind, but I do mean to give that lad of ours a lesson, once for all, that he'll remember all his life.

"There's nothing like a parable for fixing a truth in one's mind. Our Lord knew what He was about when He taught His disciples, as He nearly always did, in that manner. Now when we talk of Dick's being for ever 'up a tree,' it's what you may call a kind of figure of speech. His bad ways are always bringing him into scrapes of one kind or another, and it's you and I, Mary, that have to suffer, for every time we do all we can to get him out of his tree. He's up in that willow, I know, because he was too drunk to find his way home last night. And there he shall stay, for all I will do to help him down. Maybe the soaking he'll get before he lands on dry ground will slake his thirst for strong liquor. Come, now, wife! it's no use your fretting. You'll bless me yet for my seeming hardness, please God!" And, plying the oars with redoubled vigor, Farmer Binstead soon reached the neighboring village, in which he was accustomed to take refuge every time that his farm and house by the riverside were inundated by the waters of the lazy but mischievous Ouse.

Towing off the cattle to a rising knoll, and securing the poultry and farm utensils, had been Daniel Binstead's first care. Many past experiences of similar catastrophes had made this work a matter of routine; but not till it had been accomplished did he and his family leave the old house, the foundations of which had been so often sapped that it was scarcely safe to risk remaining in it, even though the flood would certainly not rise much above the basement.

"What can have come over father?" Dick asked himself, as with surprise and consternation he saw himself thus, for the first time in his life, left to his fate. "He's guessed right enough how I came here, and he's just carrying out the threat he made a week ago that the very next time I got stuck 'up in a tree' through drink, he'd leave me to get down by myself. Plague take the drink! It isn't worth the botherations it's always getting me into. But I can't stop here for days. The sooner I get down the better. A plague upon that 'Fox and Hounds.' There's nothing for it but a sousing."

So saying he took off his boots, and tying them in his wollen "comforter" round his neck, Dick resolutely descended from his perch on the willow and dropped into the chill water, by dint of wading and an occasional swim getting at last to shore in safety.

But poor Dick had caught, notwithstanding the dry clothes and hot coffee with which his mother welcomed him on landing, a chill which turned to rheumatic fever and brought him to within a foot of the grave. His father was well-nigh beside himself with remorse and despair.

"It's all my doing, Mary!" he sobbed, while he thought his boy unconscious. "But I meant it for the best, God knows! I'd give my life for you, Dick my own dear lad, if only you might live and be a credit and a blessing to your mother!"

"Father!"

"Dick!"

There was no longer the vacant look in the sufferer's eye, but a sober wistfulness, gentle and earnest as that of a little child. Daniel Binstead put his head down to catch the words that were so faint as to be almost inaudible.

"Never again, father—never again—God helping me! I'm down the tree now, and—if I live, it—won't be—my fault—if I ever get—up into one—again!"

"My boy—my boy!" was all the glad and thankful parent could say. They knelt by that bedside hand in hand together, and if ever son was prayed for, that son was Dick. He is now a prosperous and happy man, worth of the devotion of the good woman he soon after his recovery made his wife, and is likely to remain a living example of sobriety and respectability to the [illegible] up was "sonny" that plays [illegible] across his father's [illegible], if he should live to sonny's estate.

Folks may laugh at him; but Dick Binstead never passes that particular willow tree without raising his hat—"For," it is his custom to say, "that tree there was God Almighty's instrument for saving both my body and soul from ruin!"

Engines Half Human.

A great many tales have been told about railroad engineers and the queer notions they have about their "pets," as they call them. Some of these stories look all right in print, but in reality they are pure inventions. The Globe Democrat correspondent resolved to interview a number of railroad engineers in view of securing their experiences with locomotives, and to find out, if possible, whether engineers, as a rule are superstitious.

Creston is quite a railroad town, and is the end of a division. It is no trick at all to meet a half dozen railroad engineers, and as they are all good fellows, an interview is cheerfully granted.

Tom H—— is one of the oldest and most reliable engineers on the C., B. & Q. railroad. Being asked concerning locomotives and their engineers, he said:

"A locomotive engine is, to my mind, as near human as any inanimate object can be. Sometimes I think that they are more than half human. Of course that's all fancy though. I have driven this engine, No 483, for ten or fifteen years, and I know every inch of her, and know how to manage the old lady. Some days she gets cross and doesn't seem to care about working. Then I have got to coax her. Other days she'll feel bad and take on at a dreadful rate; then I've got to doctor her carefully. We fellows have a way of tending to these little matters. As a general rule my engine is in good trim and goes like a bird. She acts like a human, trembling with excitement if there is a prospect for fast running.

"Do I believe in presentiments? Well, I'll have to say yes. The night we went into a ditch near Malvern, smashing up things badly, I told Jim (the fireman) a half hour before the accident happened that something was coming, because I never before knew the engine to act so queer. She didn't want to go, and when I crowded her she pounded badly, seeming to drag like, along the rails. When the poor girl toppled over on her back into the ditch I thought she groaned awfully. I believe an engine smells danger ahead, somehow, and then goes to tremblin' and pounding. Leastwise mine always did."

"Ever see any ghosts?"

"Well, can't say that I ever did but once. We were coming west from Ottumwa about midnight. It was moonlight, and I could see ahead pretty well. We were nearing a place where a young girl had been killed while crossing the track on a little pony. As we came up rapidly I noticed something white on the track in front, and presently to my horror and astonishment, I saw the shadowy outline of a young girl. She was holding a little pony by the bridle rein, and the animal was prancing with fright. Both were square on the track. I blew the whistle and turned on the air. At this moment the girl turned her face toward the engine. A long cruel red scar extended from her forehead to the chin. Her eyes had a pitiful look. But we couldn't have stopped the train for our lives. We dashed upon them and—went through the apparition like it was a cloud of mist. I felt a chilly sensation as we passed, and my blouse was damp, as if dew had fallen upon it. That was the only apparition I ever saw. Poor W—— ran over the girl and has never ceased to grieve about it."

It is almost amusing to note the myriad of queer fancies that engineers have about certain things. Yet, as far as known, these fancies do not debar them from being brave and trustworthy men. While they may have many a superstitious fear that an accident is impending, it does not unnerve them, and is more likely to keep them on a sharper lookout. Many an engineer believes that his fat is only a question of time, while others believe themselves to be insured against accidents.

It is said that the engineer on one of the express trains that telescoped between Creston an Ottumwa some years ago, when so many passengers were killed, had vague forebodings of impending disaster for several days. It was a feeling that he could not shake off. His intuition proved correct, and, through the blunder of an operator, a horrible accident happened.

A Week Too Late.

A young man about twenty-three years of age, dressed like a farmer, had his feet on the car seat in front of him and was reading a novel, when, according to the New York Sun, one of the boys went over to him and observed.

"I've just made a bet of five dollars on you."

"On me? What is it?"

"I've bet five dollars that you will suicide within a week. I've been watching you very closely for the last half hour, and all signs indicate melancholy and despondency. Have you selected any particular line of killing yourself—poison, the rope, drowning or hanging?"

"Did you actually bet five dollars?" anxiously asked the young man.

"I did."

"Pay if you lose?"

"I'll have to."

"That's too bad. I wish I could have seen you last week."

"Why last week?"

"Be cause I had the ager every day right along—two cows were sick on my hands—my girl had gone dead back on me, and I expected a windmill man was going to beat me out of four hundred dollars. I did kinder think of suicide."

But now?"

"All is changed. Cows got well ager all gone—gal has set the day for next Wednesday, and the windmill man is straighter than a board. Durn my hide if I hain't going to try and live five thousand years."

TRAINING.—The song with which you sing that child to sleep will echo through all its life, and ring back from the very arches of heaven. I think that often the first seven years of a child's life decides whether it shall be irascible, waspish, rude, false, hypocritical, or gentle, truthful, frank, obedient, honest and Christian. The present generation of men will pass off very much as they are now. Although the Gospel is offered them, the general rule is that drunkards die drunkards, thieves die thieves, libertines die libertines. Therefore in the youth we turn. Before they sow wild oats, get them to sow wheat and barley. You fill the bushel measure with good corn and there will be no room for husks.—Talmage.

Huntersville, W. Va.

February 6, 1890.

Thousands of people are starving in thirteen counties of South Dakota, owing to the failure of the crops for four seasons in succession.

A Kansas farmer hauled a two mule load of corn to market not long since and brought back home as the proceeds a keg of nails.

The grippe of 1889-90 will long be noted as having picked out and carried off many prominent people for its victims.

Statistics are said to show that painted wooden houses are the healthiest, and that brick houses, also painted, are healthier than stone.

W. E. McClellan a brakeman on the C. & O., was killed last week at Covington, Va., by falling off his train.

A Shooting scrape occurred at Hinton, Summers Co., last week in which one of her citizens was shot and came very near being killed.

Joseph Chaplean was sentenced at Plattsburg, N. Y., to be executed by electricity on March 3, at Dannemore Prison, for the murder of a man named Tabor.

Perhaps the youngest couple ever married in North Carolina have just been united in Davis County. The groom is thirteen and his bride two years younger.

Wm. H. Morris, an attorney of Charleston, who voted for Fleming ing for Governor, and charged by Goff with being insane, has sued the gentleman for $30,000 libel.

Miss Bisland, who went around the world for The Cosmopolitan, in the indeavor to beat the time of Miss Bly, made the trip in 76 days 16 hours and 48 minutes.

The New York State Senate amended the World's Fair bill by adding 30 names to the list of corporators and making it distinctively a Republican organization. It is believed that this action will prevent the holding of a World's Fair in New York.

Mr. J. M. Bailey, one of the most prominent citizens, and at one time Sheriff of Mercer county, was killed on the railroad at Bluefield on Saturday, Jan. 25th. He was standing on the company's yard, and in endeavoring to avoid an approaching train stepped backwards in front of the yard engine.

Postmaster General Wanamaker has approved the design and color for the new two cent postage stamps. The designs for the other denominations are well under way, and it is thought the new series will be ready for distribution in almost a month.

Colonel John Mason Brown, one of the most prominent lawyers in Kentucky, and a man of national reputation, died of pneumonia at Louisville, on the 29 inst.

Kentucky has long been distinguished as the unrivaled producer of handsome women and fast hosres. Now she has added a wonderful prodigity to her list of attractions. At Hopkinsville a colored babe was born three months ago which can now talk plainly, and which, at the age of three weeks, could pronounce some words distinctly.

The St. Paul Pioneer Press says of the recent Governor of Ohio: "The passing of Foraker will not be regretted. He is a politician of a small and vulgar type. He has succeeded largely by bluster and appeals to popular passion rather than reason. He is not in politics to support principles. He has been a loud talker, and made himself 'solid with the boys.' He has caught eagerly at every chance for a sensation, and catered to the demagogic spirit. His aim was personal, and the open distrust of other leaders is now justified. This episode completely finishes his political career."

Suit for Slander.

William Johnson (colored) has brought a suit for slander in Monroe Circuit Court, against Mr. H. C. Hite, R. R. Agent at Alderson, this county, claiming damages in the sum of $5,000. The plaintiff complains that Mr. Hite charged him with stealing a barrel of whisky from the Depot at Alderson, during the Holidays, last month, which he alleges did great damage to his character. Johnson has retained Dr. W. P. Rucker of Lewisburg, as his counsel.—Monroe Watchman.

Thunderation! who ever heard of any one stealing liquor. Occasionally, around these parts, a jug wiil walk away from the owner, but don't think anybody ever heard of any being stolen.

Protected Farmers.

Farmers of the west have voted persistently for the system of protection. It now comes to them with a shock that English syndicates are refusing to loan money on farm mortgages in this country, while eagerly seeking to purchase manufactories.

It is doubtless true, as stated by an organ of high taxes, that the demand for money upon mortgages by western farmers is constantly increasing. But it cannot be that the organ has correctly stated the causes. These connot be found in the intemperance or extravagance of the farmers, because the difficulty exists equally in Kansas, where prohibition has lessened the drink habit, and also in states east of the Missouri river, where such laws do not prevail. In either case will it be possible to accuse the farmers of gross extravagance—except as they build too large fires with the products of their corn fields. Even by mortgaging their farms luxuries have been unknown to these toilers. Nor can it be said that they lack skill, since they have demonstrated their ability to raise corn cheaper than they can buy coal protected with a tax of 75 cents a ton. Nor can it be from the lack of rain, as farmers are bankrupt borrowers even within the rain belt.

But the comments of the high-tax press will serve to call attention to the fact that protection does not protect, and the conclusion will be reached that loans cannot be laid safely on farms whose owners are forced to burn their corn for fuel and to pay a tax of 75 per cent on their blankets. The woolen mills may be kept running, but the sheriff will take the farms.—Ex.

The senate committe on naval affairs has decided to recommend the construction of the following vessels:

Thirty-eight battle ships to cost $177,490,000.

Six harbor defense monitors, $25,000,000.

One cruising monitor, $1,900,000.

Eleven rams, $19,500,000.

Forty-one armored cruisers, $100,500,000.

Ten gun vessels and dispatch boats, $4,500,000.

One hundred and twenty torpedo boats and cruisers, $20,565,000.

Two hundred and seventy seven vessels to cost $349,515,000.

Five hundred and four vessels at a cost of $700,000,000! With this accomplished we could twist the British lion's tail. This looks as if the senate committee had little faith in the future of arbitration.

A NEW RAILROAD.

The Virginia, Parkersburg & Ohio Co. and What it Proposes to Do.

We learn the following from the Zanesville, O., Times Recorder: What is known as the Black Diamond System of railways, which now consists of three roads in Ohio and one in West Virginia, one of which is the Virginia, Parkersburg & Ohio Railway Co., held their annual election of directors and officials for 1890 on Saturday, Jan 25th. The V., P.& O. Ry. Co.'s "Sea Board line" will run from Parkersburg via Elizabeth, Grantsville, Glennville, Addison, crossing the Chesapeake & Ohio railway near White Sulphur Springs station, to Virginia state line, there to meet the Virginia & North Carolina division of the Black Diamond system from Virginia state line to Mt. Airy, North Carolina, which, with the extension of the Cape Fear & Yadkin Valley to Southport, N. C., on the Atlantic ocean which is to be the Sea Board port of the Black Diamond system of railways.

—The robins have again made their appearance.

—Sheriff M. J. McNeel, was in Huntersville, last week.

—"My name is mud," says the streets of Huntersville.

—We will give our readers the particulars of the Fleming Goff contest next week.

—Mr. A. A. Cox, died at his home at Alvon, Greenbrier Co., on the 25th inst.

—Mr. Jubal McCormick, died at his home in Union, Monroe Co., on Jan. 29, in the 60 year of his age.

—H. A. Yeager, Esq., of Cheyenne, Wyoming Ty., was in to see us last Saturday.

—Allen Pryor and Jas. Lee, both colored, died near Mill Point, last week. They were very old men.

—Thanks, awfully, to our correspondents for their punctuality of late.

—The mail route between this place and Alvon, Greenbrier Co., has been discontinued.

—Attorney H. S. Rucker, started for Lynchburg, Tuesday morning on a week's business trip.

—Ground hog day has come and gone and from the appearance of the weather since, he didn't see his shadow.

—"Calico Joe" at the Court house to night. Don't miss seeing him, it will be a grand treat. Doors open at 7 o'clock. Admission 10 & 15c.

—Mrs. A. D. Johnston, died at her home in Lewisburg on the 30 inst., in about the 80th year of her age.

—About four inches of snow last Sunday, but it didn't lay on the ground long, and now the atmosphere is as warm and balmy as a May day.

—Flourney, Price and Kee, made magnificent arguments in the Fleming Goff contest for the majority, leaving no manner of doubt of Fleming's honest election.

—A charter has been granted to the Ronceverte, Lewisburg and Coal Knob Railroad, organized for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from Ronceverte to Grafton.

—An attempt was made by the Republicans to bribe the Legislature in the Fleming Goff contest, but it is to be hoped by all honest men they failed.

—Miss Frances Ellen Catherine Geiger, and Mr. Wm. L. Gay, were married last week, at the home of the bride's father, near Driftwood this county, by the Rev. Geo. P. Moore. THE TIMES extends congratulations.

—"Ayer's Cherry Pectoral has given me great relief in bronchitis. Within a month I have sent some of this preparation to a friend suffering from bronchitis and asthma. It has done him so much good that he writes for more."—Charles F. Dunterville, Plymouth, England.

—The Braxton Democrat, has entered upon its 8 volume. It has all the qualities of a first class local newspaper and last but not least is Democratic from skin to core. May it live long and prosper.

—On Friday of last week while Marion Butcher, of New Interest, was crossing the railroad with a team, his horses became unmanageable and he was unable to get out of the way of the train. His head was severed from his body. The horses were not hurt.—Enterprise.

—A spring medicine is needed by everyone. Winter food, largely consisting of salt meat and animal fats, causes the liver to become disordered and the blood impure, hence the necessity of a cleansing medicine. The best is Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

—General Skeen, of Covington, Va., who has been in Huntersville for some time past, has had a slight attack of LaGrippe.

—The mail from Mt. Grove, failed to come Tuesday, for no reason, whatever, as we can learn. Its true the creeks were up a little, out by no means past fording, and Wednesday when it did come, didn't bring half the mail that was at the Mt., Grove post office. This sort of business is very annoying, to say nothing of the inconvenience it causes our people. If the gentleman who has the contract can't come up to time, let somebody have it that can.

The weak minded people I presume are beginning to think the gulf stream has changed back, as the chilling winter has been here for a few days

LaGrippe has showed itself in our vicinity, in a mild form, in the family of Mr. James Grogg, and is also raging in the lumber camp at Winchester.

There is a great deal of sickness in our community. Among the sick are, Mrs. Wilmoth, Mrs. Lentz, and Mrs. Slaven. But we are happy to say they are slowly recovering.

There is talk of a knitting factory being erected in our burg soon, which will be very beneficial.

Lee Wilmoth, was the guest of John Arbogast last Sunday.

John Arbogast and Wm. Hill are at the lumber camp on sheet.

The schools in this district are all in a flourishing condition.

Miss Minnie Clark's school will soon close. She will then go to the wilds of the sinks. May success go with her.

Success to THE TIMES.

Fine day.

I told you to stay in Sunday.

Swecker has the grippe, but thinks he will be able to give you some good bargains at Edray, Friday and Saturday.

Rain, snow and mud until you can't rest.

Capt. E. A. Smith, is about ready with his lumber drive.

Col. Dan O'Connell, was up last week sliding logs.

Lots of Drummers.

Deputy Sheriff Arbogast, of Highland, was out last week, looking up some roofing and spouting jobs.

Most of our roads are getting impassable. They ought to be bridged.

We want a first class shoemaker. Come at once.

E. A. Moore, Esq., lost a fine horse.

Most everybody has the grippe.

Dr. Ligan, was over to see Mr. Pritchard who is on the sick list.

The most of the free schools are closing out, and but few know that there has been any in the district.

The board of education have stopped exhibition spelling matches, and but little interest is taken by the little ones.

Mosey Flat Items.

As I haven't seen anything in THE TIMES, from this section for sometime, I will endeavor to give a few items.

A considerable snow fell here last Saturday and Sunday nights, which reminded us again of winter, and was enjoyed by all.

Rev. Geo. Hannah, has been conducting a meeting at the Moore school house on Back Alleghany, and we learn that he has had marked success, which has been the case at most of his appointments in this part of the county.

We learn that Mr. F. R. Stalnaker who is teaching school at Brush Run set out for prospective courtship at the beginning of the meeting, which was conducted, at that place by the Rev. Hannah and Arbogast, but we are sorry to learn that he was nipped in the bud, by one Miss Teny Hinkle, and he has been on the decline ever since.

Our school is progressing smoothly under the management of T. W. McCoy with an enrollment of 31 pupils.

Mr. C. L. Burner our honorable constable has been so pressed with business for some time past that he has been thinking of employing an assistant.

Mr. J. W. Riley, who is on the road between this place and Staunton, will have a disagreeable trip, we fear, as the roads have become very muddy since he started.

Bad colds are prevalent in this part of the county.

Success to our County paper.

Married.

On Thursday morning, January 30th, 1890, at the residence of the bride's parents, on Clover Creek, in Pocahontas County, W. Va., in the presence of an appriciative assembly of friends, by Geo. P. Moore, Mr. William L. Gay, to Miss Frances E. C. Geiger attended by Mr. John D. Gay with Miss Allie Closnan and Mr. Ellis Sharp with Miss Mary Gay.

After the marriage ceremony the party were invited to partake of a frugal repast, prepared by our host and hostess and very efficiently served with the assistance of Squire J. W. Price and Mr. Showalter of which all partook with a free good will.

After bidding home and parents good-bye, the wedding party hied away, over hill and vale, through mud and water, ten miles to the residence of Sam'l M. Gay, Esq., where fully 150 invited guests awaited their arrival, about 1 o'clock and greeted them with the usual reception ceremony, and soon the crowd were invited to begin to partake of the sumptious feast provided by Mr. Gay, for his friends which was continued until after nightfall, when all were served and happy. Good feeling prevailed throughout, and the young couple have the good wishes of their friends.

Great Faith in the Rector.

The author of "Reminiscences of a Literary and Clerical Life," himself a clergyman, narrates an amusing anecdote which his revered grandfather used to tell about an ignorant young couple in his parish. The old minister had married them, but the marriage had turned out to be ill-advised, and after a while things came to a desperate pass.

The couple had vast, undefined ideas of what a rector could do, and it entered into their foolish minds that he might be able to undo their unhappy marriage. So they asked him whether he could take them into church again and perform some service that would get them free, as they had been before. The rector meditated for a moment.

"Yes," he said, "I think if you come to church I can put you in the way of becoming unmarried. But it is a curious kind of business, and instead of coming to the altar, as before, you will have to go into the belfry."

The unfortunate pair readily assented, and at an appointed hour went to the church, where the rector marched them into the belfry.

"You see those two trestles," he began. "The husband will have to get on one of them and the wife on the other."

With much wonderment the man and woman followed his instructions.

"Now each of you take a bellrope in your hand."

This was done.

"Now, then, tie the ropes round your necks and jump off the trestles."

"Good lack, sir!" said one of them, "we should be hanging ourselves!"

"Exactly," said the minister, "that is just what I mean. The only way in which you can unmarry yourselves in church is by hanging yourselves in the belfry."

The young couple dropped the ropes in haste, and the minister proceeded to give them a lecture upon mutual forbearance and affection, it is to be hoped with good results.

Cures for Influenza.

"Got the influenza?" asked a man on the street yesterday, as his companion recovered from a coughing spell.

"Yes, I've got the influenza," replied the other, defiantly, "and I don't want any sure cures, either."

"I was just going to suggest——"

"Well, don't do it. I've taken all the known remedies. I came down town yesterday with a bad case. The first man I saw said: 'Awful cough you have. Ought to stop that. Come with me and I'll fix you.'

"Then he took me into a bar room and told the bar tender to put a little glycerine into a glass and turn some brandy in on top of it. I drank it and it did me good, so I took several doses. We separated and I met another friend.

"'Influenza?' he said, as I sneezed. 'I'll tell you how to cure that. Fixed me in a day.'

"He escorted me into a shop where liquid refreshments are dispensed and gave me a hot rum with molasses. That also seemed to hit the right spot and I took a number. I felt better in most every way.

"Well, when I went out of there I saw another friend.

"'Cold?' he said as I blew my nose. 'I'll bust that up in two shakes of a lamb's tail.'

"I got some quinine with a large dose of whiskey adjoining this time, and I swear I thought it did me a power of good. I certainly felt well. I felt so well that I nearly kicked the clock off the mantel when I got home. I offered to spar my wife, London prize-ring rules to govern, and all was well until I got up in the morning. Then I had a head and a worse case of grip than I had before. Take my advice and steer clear of the man with a remedy."

Thou, that hast given so much to me, give me one thing more—a grateful heart.

We swallow at one mouthful the lie that flatters, and drink drop by drop the truth that is bitter.

Dost thou love life? Then do not squander time; for that is the stuff life is made of.

Contemn rest and thou shalt gain rest, contemn earth, and thou shalt gain Heaven.

Selfishness is that detestable vice which no one will forgive in others, and no one is without himself.

Do all that you can to stand, and then fear least you may fall, and by the grace of God you are safe.

Better follow the sternness of truth than the glittering delusion of a life. Men often follow lies because they shine.

Dark seasons are never pleasant to us, but are always good for us. A cloudless sky could never produce a good harvest.

The highest gift and favor of God is a pious, kind, godly and domestic wife, with whom thou mayest live peaceably, and to whom thou mayest intrust all thy possessions; yea, thy body and thy life.

Gussy de Broadway (staring at Col. Top Boots, who has just swallowed two inches of brandy neat)—Um—ah—nevah mix your drinks I see, Cunnell?

Colonel—Yes sah. Always take watah with my likah, sah!

Gussy—Didn't see any just now, bah Jove!

Colonel—well sah. You see I fill the glass with likah, sah—and then my mouth watahs, sah.

Mrs. Riverside Rives—My dear Miss Fulton; how lovely to see you here! Were parties very different in your day?

Miss Ann Fulton—Well, somewhat. In my day the girls wore one buttoned gloves, and dresses buttoned up to the neck; now they wear one buttoned dresses and gloves buttoned up to the neck.

"You can't say that English syndicates have no show in this country," remarked Squidding.

"Why?" asked McSwilligen.

"Because one of them has just bought Forepaugh's circus."

"Yes," said the oldest inhabitant "this is a pretty mild winter, but I remember a season that was much warmer than this."

"How long ago was that?" queried his listeners.

"Only last summer."

"You know what a fashion Miss Gnawledge has of quoting proverbs at all times?"

"Yes."

"Well, last night as I remarked about midnight that I must go, she looked at the clock and murmured, 'Better late than never.'"

WHO WAS IT.

BY SHIRLEY BROWNE

"It wasn't a bad idea of mine, takin' city boarders," said Mrs. Maydew, as she sat in front of the kitchen table counting out bills of various denominations. "Just look at that, Zuleima—what I've cleared this summer, free of all expenses!"

"But it wasn't altogether your idea, mother," said Zuleima. "It was Cousin Maria's."

"Well, p'r'aps she did suggest it," said Mrs. Maydew; "but I carried it out—and a great deal better speculation I found it than sewing on shirts or taking in shoes to bind; and I've made the Durham cow's price—and I've bought Deacon Doubleday's second hand wagon, and a new stair carpet, and I've got a hundred dollars to put in the bank, besides all that!"

Zuleima listened with a sweet, abstracted smile. Durham cows—second hand wagons—bank accounts—what was that to the great happiness that had come to her through this city boarder experiment!

"Ought I to tell mother now, or ought I to leave it to him?" she questioned herself; and while she still deliberated, Mrs. Maydew's sharp, high pitched voice broke in upon the current of her thoughts.

"And really, now I come to think on't, I don't know but what I like young Fairgrave the best of any boarder we've had. Didn't you, Zuleima?"

The soft flood of carmine rushed to the girl's cheek, her eyelids drooped.

"Yes," she answered, almost inaudibly; "I—I liked him very well."

"And them pictures he painted were very good," went on unconscious Mrs. Maydew, "though they wasn't as bright colored as the chromo of 'Abraham A sacrificin' Isaac' over Miss Parker's parlor mantel and them views of ruined castles that Ruth Chicksey bought of the peddler for a dollar and a half each, gilt frames and all. They were sort o' dim colored, you know and the sun didn't seem to shine real bright in 'em. But it's strange, ain't it, about his bein' engaged?"

"Engaged!" Zuleima started and crimsoned more intensely than ever, a shy smile broke out upon her lips. Her secret, then, was out! Who could have betrayed it? Perhaps Vernon himself.

"I didn't believe a word of it at first," added Mrs. Maydew, rolling up her bills and placing them in a discolored leather pocket-book. Zuleima turned her face away, still smiling. "And she twice his age, at least," went on Mrs. Maydew.

"She? Who do you mean?"

"Maria, of course," said Mrs. Maydew. "I've always heard that there's no fool like an old fool, and I begin to believe it."

"Mother," cried Zuleima, "what do you mean?"

"La!" said Mrs. Maydew, "is it possible you hain't read that letter that came this mornin'? She's to be married to Fairgrave in November the poor, silly old goose—and she wants you to come up and help buy her wedding clothes. I couldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it writ and signed and sealed under her own name. And she five-and-forty if she's a day!"

Zuleima stood bewildered and amazed. The walls seemed to be whirling around her; the ticking of the old clock grew faint in her ears. Vernon Fairgrave engaged to Miss Maria Denham after all the sweet words he had whispered in her ear, all the tender hand pressures—the unutterable looks of love that passed between them! But, after all, now that she came to look dispassionately back on the past, she could not recall that he had ever said to her in so many words, "Will you be my wife?" He had never placed a betrothal ring on her finger; he had contented himself with vague words—glances which could not absolutely be interpreted into sentences, and a horrible sensation of shame and anger seemed to fill her veins with fire instead of blood as she thought of how she had been duped.

"He has been making game of me," she thought. "He has enjoyed his summer in the wilderness, and now he is going away—to leave me without a pang of remorse! Oh, Heaven! and how am I to endure it?"

"Ain't you well, Zuleima?" Mrs. Maydew asked with rather a frightened glance at her daughter. "I knowed you hadn't ought to go out into the hot sun to pick them last Lima beans to dry. Lay down, and let me get you the camphor bottle to smell to."

But Zuleima recovered herself with an effort.

"I'm well enough," said she. "Where is Maria's letter, mother? I want to read it. "Well, I never should have suspected Mr. Fairgrave of being a fortune hunter."

"It's a great thing to have a little money," shrewdly remarked Mrs. Maydew. "Though Maria ain't bad lookin', neither, for a woman of her years; not sence she got them new false teeth o' hern."

For Miss Denham was the one well-to-do member of the family, owing to a lucky speculation in coal-mine shares, on the part of the late Doctor Denham, whose only descendant she was—a plump, high-complexioned old maid with sparkling black eyes like jet beads, and a loud, cheery voice.

It was nearly noon the next day when Vernon Fairgrave strolled up to the house. Mrs. Maydew greeted him with a broad smile.

"Zuleima? She ain't home," said she, "She is gone to the city to Maria's to buy weddin' clothes. Aha! you see I know your secret?"

"She has told you then?"

"Of course she's told me?" said Mrs. Maydew, shaking the young artist's hand as if it were a pump-handle. "And I wish you all happiness, I'm sure. She's a good girl, if she ain't exactly a beauty, and—"

"But I think she is a beauty, Mrs. Maydew."

"Tastes differ," said the matron, with a shrug of the shoulders. "And I don't doubt she'll make you a good wife. 'Handsome is as handsome does,' that's my motto. Eh? Going to the city? Well, give her my love."

Meanwhile Zuleima, seated among the splendors of her cousin's trousseau, was looking with unseeing eyes at satins, silks, tulles, gloves, and bonnets, while Maria Denham in a loud voice recounted the various stages of the prospective bridal trip.

"We're to go to Niagara,' said she, "though I'm sure I don't know why, I never did take stock in water-falls, and then down the St. Lawrence, past the Thousand Islands—I wonder if anybody ever counted 'em, I sha'n't, I know—to Montreal. Eh, Zuleima? I took you by surprise, did I?"

"Rather," Zuleima answered, huskily.

"You thought I was a foregone conclusion—a desperate old maid," cried the bride-elect, with a peal of laughter. "Well, you see, I wasn't. Never mind, Zuleima, Mr. Fairgrave says—"

"And are you really to have a pink satin ball-dress," interrupted Zuleima, starting nervously at the sound of the name which had once been the sweetest music in her ears. "Why didn't you have heliotrope color instead?"

"He likes pink," said Maria, placidly. "It's his favorite color. And I should look a fright in heliotrope! But really, Zuleima, haven't you suspected anything all along?"

"No."

"Then you must have been stone blind," complacently observed the bride, holding up the plump engagement finger, on which sparkled a pure white diamond. "And I've worn this all along."

Zuleima tried to smile, but her heart was as ice within her. More and more she felt convinced that it was of no use trying to face things out. She could not stand calmly by and see another woman's palace of happiness rising up on the ashes of her own dead hopes. The "pride," the "spirit" on which she had relied were but broken reeds to lean upon. She would have given worlds, had they been hers, for a chance to hide herself away and weep out the anguish of her poor bleeding heart in solitude.

"I have been a fool," she told herself, "and all to win the chance of confronting him with his falsehood and baseness! Why did I not remain at home?"

Just then a servant brought in a card. Miss Denham pounced eagerly upon it.

"It's him!" said she joyously.

Zuleima recoiled as if an arrow had struck her.

"Your—your lover?" she gasped.

"Just that," nodded Maria, with an excellent view of the new false teeth. "Here, child, where are you going to? That door leads into the umbrella closet! What are you running away for, anyhow? Why shouldn't you stop and speak to your new cousin, eh?"

In her perturbation poor Zuleima had seized hold of the wrong door-handle, and ere she could recover herself the opposite portals were thrown wide open, and in walked a stout gentleman with a clean-shaven face and a shining bald head, carrying in one hand a gold-handled cane, and in the other a bouquet the size of a small haystack.

"My angel!" he said, dramatically.

Miss Maria jumped up and accorded him a hearty kiss.

"I'm so glad you happened to come in just now," said she. "Here's my cousin Zuleima Maydew. Zuleima, this is Mr. Fairgrave.

"Mr.—Fairgrave.

Maria burst out laughing once more.

"Well, I don't wonder you're amazed," said she. "Come to remember, you haven't any of you seen Nicholas before, and I'd forgotten to tell you how stout he was. Ain't much like his nephew, eh? Nicholas this is the young lady whose folks Vernon boarded with this summer; I've told you about 'em often."

"Happy to meet her. I'm sure," said Mr. Nicholas Fairgrave, on whose visage brooded a perpetual smile—possibly at the prospect of his matrimonial good fortune—and in the same instant Vernon Fairgrave's face was seen looking over his kinsman's broad shoulder.

"I thought I should find you here Zuleima," he said, brightening up.

"You can't think, my darling, how this secret of Uncle Nicholas' has embarrassed me these past weeks. But now you've found it out, I shall have a little peace once more."

"And upon my word," added Maria, "I don't see any reason why we shouldn't have a double wedding! Eh, Miss Rosy-face?" to Zuleima.

And in Zuleima's mingled wonder, delight and bewilderment she spoke no word of opposition to this new plan. Why should she, after all? Why should she postpone the dawning of her life's happiness?

But Mrs. Maydew's astonishment was beyond the power of words to describe.

"I thought of course it was Maria," said she.

"Why, didn't I tell you who it was?" rather sharply demanded Miss Denham.

"You said Mr. Fairgrave."

"Well, it was Mr. Fairgrave."

"How was I to know there were two Mr. Fairgraves?" demanded Mrs. Maydew, in an injured voice, and Maria's answer was another of those hearty peals of laughter that caused Mrs. Maydew to say irritably:

"I do believe she does it a purpose to show that set o' new false teeth!"

Zacharias Did It.

Old Zack shuffled forward, as his name was called, closely followed by the officer who had captured him in one of his nocturnal chicken-stealing expeditions. He held his catskin cap tightly under his arm, rubbing his woolly head thoughtfully with his disengaged hand.

"Well, prisoner, what is your name?"

"Zacharias Tobias."

"What?"

"Zacharias Tobias."

"Are you sure it is not Ananias?"

"I ain't sure of nuffin', yer honor; but I 'spects it'll be be Dennis fo' I gits out ob yere."

"Well Dennis—I should say Ananias—you were found in Deacon Smith's chicken-coop this morning at three o'clock, I believe."

"Quarter, pas' three, yer honor."

"Well, then, 3:15, to be more exact. I suppose you went there to read poetry."

"Sar?"

"Did you go there to read poetry?"

"Eat poultry? No, sar; don't want no raw poultry 'bout dis niggah. Don't eat poultry till it's done cooked."

"Well, Dennis, I am afraid your poultry will be cooked this time—your goose at least. Do you think you can get it done in thirty days?"

"It's pretty tough, yer honor—"

"Well, then, make it sixty days, so as to be on the safe side."

And as old Zach moved away he murmured, softly: "Dun fixed it this time; bound ter get three square meals a day for the next two months, sho'!"

"I am afraid," said Algernon, in a despairing tone, "that you are disposed to make light of my declaration of affection."

"Why, Mr. De Jones, how could you have guessed it?"

"Guessed what?"

"That I gave your last letter to brother Harry to light his cigar with."

One of our co-temporaries, in noting the successful career of a venerable man who has just died in Maine, makes the startling statement that "he was born without a dollar in his pocket."

GOVERNOR FLEMING.

At last, after more than a year's waiting and watching, one of the most notable contests in the history of the country has been determined. Last week the West Virginia Legislature by a vote of 43 to 40 adopted the report of the Committee to which had previously been referred the contest of Fleming and Goff. By the report of that committee Fleming is clearly shown to have received a majority of the votes legally cast for Governor, and the adoption of the report placed him where the voice of the people placed him long ago, in the Governor's chair. But, ah! how hard the republicans die! They cry fraud! but can't point to a single instance where it has been perpetrated, except by their own party; they say it is a shame for a democratic body to displace a republican whose election appears on the face of the returns, but they don't have a word to say about that republican house at Washington ousting Congressman Jackson a few days ago; they say that the seating of Fleming will be the death of the democrating party in West Virginia; if they are sincere in this view, why do they take it so hard? The democrats would rejoice to sacrifice a political idol, if by so doing they could insure the death of the republican party. We fear they don't believe the party dead, else they would cease their wailing and would not longer refuse to be comforted. The democratic party may die, but, mark you, her ghost will will be hard to down. If, however, their pretended belief that we are dead, will afford them any consolation in the hour of mourning, or in any degree calm their rage, let them believe on. Take not away their only solace. Let them enjoy as long as they can the bliss of their ignorance; for sooner or later they must learn that the free sons of West Virginia are not of that class who repudiate a party because she demands her rights.

As to the fallen idol Goff we haven't a harmful word to utter, concerning the dead we would not willingly speak unkindly; but with respectful silence we behold him borne from the Legislative hall on his funeral Carr.

President Carr of the Senate owed his election to republican votes, and as long as he could, gratefully acknowledge his debt by voting with the republican party; but when it came to decide between Fleming and Goff, his conscience would let him go no further, but made his duty so plain that he was obliged in justice to forsake his former habit and vote for Fleming. Well done, good and faithful servant.

Labor is protected in this country till it accumulates a nest egg, then robbed by injustice and turned out to find the poor house and pauper burial ground.

Ah, Goff!—
How talkative at first lifts up his plumes!
How bravely doth he speak! How he presumes
To drive down all before him! But so soon
As Fleming talk'd of honest work, like the moon
That's past the full, into the wane he goes;
And so will a'l but he that honest-work know.

The Abram Cox Stove Works, Lansdale, Pa., were burned, on the 4th inst.; loss $73,000.

There was a net increase of $3,831,423 in the circulation during January, and a net increase in the Treasury of $10,830,539.

At the Barlow book sale, in New York, a volume of letters, written by Columbus, and published in 1493 brought $2,900.

The London Times has compromised the libel suit brought by Parnell by paying the later £5,000. It pays Campbell, his secretary, £200 and meets all costs.

The Milwaukee Journal says: "Among Wisconsin Democrats here are not enough anti-Cleveland men to make even a single tail feather," much less anything that could be called a wing.

Idaho is making strenuous efforts to secure admission to the Union. But the New York Telegram thinks that "Idaho ought to be made to wait a little longer. The voting population of the Territory is about 15,000 as against 45,000 for Washington, 40,000 for Montana, 41,000 for North Dakota and 70,000 for South Dakota."

The New York Tribune published a letter from a woman who says of her husband: "He has a little farm paid for and draws a pension of $8 a month; he is well and hearty and able to work." Now if he is well and hearty and able to work we wish the Tribune would explain why he is drawing a pension of $8 a month on the ground of disability incurred in the service of his grateful country.

John L. Sullivan was present when Peter Jackson sparred with Sullivan's side partner, Jack Ashton, in Boston, and he afterwards remarked to Dan Murphy that "The Coon" was clever and a better boxer than he supposed he was. "He is an awkward man to get at," the champion is reported to have said, "but after he gets one or two right-handers all the cleverness will be knocked out of him."

WASHINGTON LETTER

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, February, 1.—Ex-Speaker Carlisle is the hero of the hour in democratic circles, for the able manner in which he has compelled the majority of the House committee on Rules to act in reporting the code of Rules sooner than they had intended. The new Rules are about as one sided and unfair to the minority as they could well be, and give Speaker Reed almost as much authority as he has exercised without them. It took seven hours to get a majority vote in their favor from the republican caucus, and from all accounts the discussion was at times extremely bitter. A democratic caucus also considered the Rules reported, and although they regard them as so many gag laws, it was decided that if the republicans would allow a reasonable time for their debate, so that their injustice might be shown to the country, no unusual obstacles would be interposed by the democrats to prevent their adoption by the majority, as they only wish to put themselves on record as protesting against their adoption.

Economical men in Congress were surprised to learn from a speech of Senator Morrill's that owing to the overcrowded condition of the public buildings in Washington $221,349 a year is spent by the Government to rent private buildings. The buildings that are worst off are the White House, the Patent office, Post office and Government Printing office. The last named is in a deplorable condition, looked at from every standpoint. It is old, and its wall are in a dangerous condition; it is unhealthy and is in constant danger from fire. There is a pretty general agreement that it will be cheaper to erect the necessary buildings than to pay such a large amount for rents. Early action is expected in Congress to relieve this unsatisfactory state of affairs.

The republicans of the House did not dare to seat Smith, of West Virginia, until they had a legal quorum of their own members present to vote him in. Had they done otherwise the Supreme Court would probably have been given an opportunity to pass on the constitutionality of Mr. Reed's ruling in the matter of a quorum of the House. The fact that the republicans waited until they had a quorum present to take the decisive vote shows how little confidence they have in the legal status of Mr. Reed's rulings.

A gloom has been spread over official and social life in Washington, owing to the deaths in the cabinet circle. Sunday morning Secretary Blaine's daughter died, and Monday morning Secretary Tracy's residence was destroyed by fire, the lives of his wife and daughter lost, and himself brought out in an unconscious condition by the firemen. The funeral of Mrs. and Miss Tracy was held in the East room at the White House on Wednesday, and a more affecting scene has never been witnessed here.

Representative Matchler, of Pennsylvania, who is one of the shrewdest democrats in the House says "Reed's rulings have made it a certainty that the democrats will have a good working majority in the next House.

The United States Supreme Court has decided that the test oath clause in the constitution of Idaho is constitutional.

The Blair educational bill, which is beginning to look hoary, was taken up this week in the Senate. It will get through the Senate and it may get through the House, but it is doubtful.

Another re-tired pension office official—First deputy Commissioner Hiram Smith—has gone. When asked for his resignation he sent it in, and thereby secured an extra month's pay, the resignation being accepted to take effect March 5th, and he has been given leave of absence to that date. He was appointed last May.

Considerable excitement was created Wednesday by the news that ex-Speaker Randall was much worse. Mr. Randall has been so deeply interested in the fight in the House that he has overtasked his brain thinking of it in order to make suggestions to the democratic leaders, and it has had a bad effect upon his health.

A bill has been introduced in the Senate to admit New Mexico. An attempt was made to have the Senate pass the bill providing for the organization of Oklahoma Territory this week, but it failed, not because of opposition, but because precedence was claimed for the Blair educational bill.

The Ohio ballot box forgery investigation was resumed this week. Among the most interesting witnesses were Governor Campbell and Murat Halstead. Ex-Governor Foraker attends every session of the committee, and seems to fully realize that he is on trial.

Mr. Harrison did not attend the Supreme Court centennial in New York on account of the sad bereavement in the homes of two of his cabinet members.

Traveler's Repose Locals.

We have a good prayermeeting at the church, near here every Wednesday night. All the young converts that professed at Brother Ballengee's meeting appear to take a great interest in the meeting. May the good work go on.

B. M. Yeager, is having a large lot of cherry logs hauled together near here, which he will have sawed this spring.

J. L. Arbogast, who fell on an ax and split his knee cap on the 14th day of last December is, improving slowly. He can walk a little by the help of one crutch.

I notice that the writer from Brush Run forgot to say, when Professor Stalnaker startes home with his best girl. He can only stand part of the long walk up the mountain. He also forgot to say the prospects are bright for a wedding at Mr. J. W. Riley's in the near future.

The snow is about two inches deep at this writing. We have had but little snow this winter, and no ice. Sleighs and skates appear to be useless property this winter.

Preston Tracy, who has been working at the lumber camp at Winchester, had the misfortune to have his leg mashed to pieces below the knee, by a log jumping off the slide.

B. B. Kerr, has completed a sheep stable, which will stable three hundred sheep. For architecture add convenience, this stable beats anything we have ever seen.

Alvin Gillispie will soon close his fifth term of school at the Hoover school house.

W. F. Grogg has built a large house on his farm and will move into it soon.

Another violent attack of La Grippe made its appearance on Brush Run in a most singular form. It is to be feared that a relapse will dislocate on F. B. Stalnaker's back.

Miss Gracy Kennedy who lives near Prof. Stalnaker's school house has also had a few attacks of "grip."

Wishing THE TIMES success, I am,

JESSIE GROSS.

Railroad Accident

A terrible accident occurred on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad near the big Pennsylvania tunnel between Hinton and Lowell in this state. The switch had been left open, and a freight train, dashing along at a pretty fair rate, shot out of the track and into the signal station, which was built near the track and on the bank of the New River. The little house was torn from the foundation and, with the telegraph operator carried into the river. The locomotive and tender also went over. The operator, engineer and fireman were drowned.

Horrible Accident

On Monday morning last, the residence, in Washington, of Benj. F. Tracy, Secretary of War, was burned, and one of his daughters Mary, was suffocated, and the French maid was burned to death, and his wife died from injuries received in the fall from the window in her effort to escape, and he himself was rendered unconscious by suffocation from the smoke, and was with great difficulty rescued and saved. It was a terrible calamity.

HENRY WATTERSON'S LUCK.

I suppose more stories could be be told about Watterson than any man who has ever stepped foot upon a race track, and they are all as full of interest as a hickory nut is full of meat. I remember something that happened in New York in the fall of 1882. I shall relate it to show the luck that Watterson has played in ever since he was born. I was with him at the time. Edgar Johnson, of Cincinnati, who was ex-Governor Hoadley's law partner, and myself met Watterson at Cincinnati and we traveled on to Gotham. Johnson is a great poker player, and he had most of our good coin before we reached our destination. * * * *

It was on a Saturday afternoon. Crickmore had beaten Hindoo in a special race. A vast crowd was present—I should say twenty thousand of New York's fashionables. The beautiful race track pulsated with enthusiasm. We had been told that Hindoo was invincible. Excellent judges of horseflesh like Jim Lawrence, the secretary of the club; Benny Bradford, Charlie Reed, Josiah Hubbard, Jimmy Lee, in fact all the talent was on Hindoo because of the form he had shown. We were on Hindoo also, much to our intense disgust. Crickmore had taken Hindoo by the head and run him to a standstill. All this time our board bill at the Everett had been increasing. We had just begun to realize this fact. After the Hindoo-Crickmore contest we had just $15 left. I went into the telegraph office and was about to wire home for more money. I think I had partially written my message when Watterson approached.

"What are you doing old man?" he asked.

"Sending home for some more stuff. We can't go much further on what we have," I replied.

"For heaven's sake, don't do that. The boys will never cease guying us," urged Watterson. "Give me what money you have and see what I can do." So I handed over what I had. I think it was $9. I'll never forget Watterson's remark as he left me. With a wave of his hand he gayly remarked, "I'll meet you in the gloaming," and disappeared in the crowd. I moved along leisurely toward the betting, wondering what Watterson would do.

The next race was the final event of a long and really sensational programme. It was a dash of three-quarters of a mile and there was a long array of starters. I should say at least a dozen, all good, second-class horses. Warfield, the representative of the Brooklyn Stable, and Cridge, a very clever sprinter, divided the honors of first choice between them. It was a great betting race. The money fairly poured into the box. I caught sight of Watterson last once. He was standing by the gate leading to the saddling paddock talking to Charley Shaver, who was dressed in the cherry and black of the Rancocas stable. Shaver was Pierre Lorillard's second jockey. He was to ride a War Dance filly called Sly Dance, which nobody paid any attention to. The filly had been running very poorly, and the odds in the books were 20 to 1 against her.

The field got a magnificent send-off and, compassed by a cloud of dust, the racers bowled merrily along the back stretch. Presently I saw the red and blue sash of the Dwyers forge to the front. It was Warfield. He was now well in the lead. Cridge was second. The pace was terrific. By three quarter post there was a clump of trees and I lost sight of the leaders for a moment. At the head of the stretch Warfield was still in front, but McLaughlin's whip arm was cleaving the air. Cridge was overhauling him fast, and the crowd cried Cridge wins!" A furlong from the winning post one of the contestants was seen to swerve to the outside of the track. But the rider quickly pulled the animal together and then came in with a frightful burst of speed. It was Sly Dance. The beautiful chestnut filly was running like a wild horse. Every muscle in Shaver's body was in motion. Midway past the grand stand Sly Dance took the lead and won by an open length.

I was watching the crowd file out of the gates and standing beside Congressman Scott when Watterson suddenly seized us both by the arm.

"Well," I asked, "what luck?"

"Bully," was Watterson's rejoinder, at the same time displaying three $5 French tickets on Sly Dance. These tickets paid $250 each. I did not telegraph for money that night.

The Atlantic-Pacific Railway Tunnel, the great project of "Brick" Pomery, is really being cut through the main range of the Rocky Mountains, sixty miles due west from Denver. It will shorten railway distance 250 miles between Denver and Salt Lake City. More than 4,000 persons are now financially interested in the enterprise. The Tunnel will be five miles long and 4,400 feet below the top of Gray's Peak. The company enters the year 1890 entirely free from floating debt, all its bills paid and work going ahead day and night in both ends of the Tunnel. By the use of modern machinery from six to ten feet headway is gained every day. More than 250 veins of gold and silver will be crossed by the Tunnel and its mineral rights alone will be worth millions. At the late election Pomeroy was elected President, and given the entire management for ten years. The company has money sufficient to carry on its work, and is taking rank among the greatest enterprise in the country. To those who care to know of it, a large descriptive illustrated pamphlet will be sent free. Address, Mark M. Pomeroy, President 234 Broadway, New York City.

She—You are very kind to invite me to go sleighing, but—did your horse ever run away?

He—Often. You see, I am careless about horses, and often let the reins fall to the bottom of the sleigh and drive with my feet.

PRETTY IS AS PRETTY DOES.

Oh, here's to the miss
With the chocolate-drop kiss,
Whose cheeks are like peaches and cream,
Whose smile is like wine
And whose eyes are divine
As the fairies I see in my dream.
She sauces her ma
And "talks back" to her pa,
And novels her hours employ,
She's pretty to see,
But please excuse me—
I would dare not marry the toy.

And here's to the girl—
A plain featured pearl—
Who scatters wherever she goes
Such kind words and deeds
As every heart needs—
Like perfume is sown by the rose.
Her hands she employs
In bringing fresh joys
To the souls that are burdened with strife,
If naught shall prevent
And win her consent
Some time I shall call her my wife.

LOST IN A MINE.

They were talking about the recent mining disaster at San Leandro that brought the conversation around to mining accidents generally, and finally one of the party recalled the Comstock terror of two years ago, when a cave in the Gould & Curry buried nine men alive.

"I had a pretty ugly experience in the mines myself eight years ago," said one of the party, an ex-Nevadan.

"I was a boy of 14 or 15 then, with about as little sense of prudence as most boys of that age, and I had a chum about as old, who was as careless as myself.

"We lived to the north end of Virginia City, and had a big back yard in which we always planned our expeditions. One day, in poking around that big yard! we found near an old shed a big iron ring. This was fastened to a heavy plank cover that hid the mouth of an old shaft. This cover was hid by a couple of inches of dirt.

"When the first big excitement struck the Comstock everybody went to digging, and now the whole side of Mt. Davidson is as full of abandoned shafs as a Swiss cheese is of holes. Within the town limits all the abandoned shafts are filled up or covered so as to keep belated pedestrians out of them. The mine we decovered in the corner of the yard had been too extensively worked to allow of its being filled up, and therefore had been covered up as described.

"We didn't lose much time in prying up that cover and beginning the exploration of what we found. The shaft was evidently an upraise from some drift of the lower mines, for it went down at an angle of about 45. As soon as we had descended 30 feet we saw that the workings had been very extensive indeed, for drifts and winzes went off from the main shaft in every direction. We went into several of these but always found ourselves stopped by a cave, for the workings were very old. Some shovels and picks that we discovered were almost gone with rust, and the timbers where they stood were bent and crushed and rotten. By guarded inquiries we found that it was in the ground of the Ophir Mining Company, and a drift had probably been extended to this place in an attempt to strike a ledge to the west. We knew that the old workings must connect with it somewhere, for the air was good and there was a steady up draught.

"Finally the idea took possession of us to go from our mine into some of the working ones and come up that way.

"The Andes shaft was only a few hundred yards from our mine, and we knew they must be connected. We knew enough about the mines to take what we thought were sufficient precautions against getting lost. The grain of the rock showed us the directions as surely as a compass, so we were not at all apprehensive. We thought that we might be down for several hours, however, and so took along a number of extra candles and some lunch. Thus fixed we began to clamber down the old shaft. A hundred feet below the surface we found some more drifts, and spent an hour or so in them. But all were either blocked with caves or else stopped in the solid porphyry. So we had to go on clambering down the incline.

"Ben was ahead, and I saw him stop, and then he shouted back to me:

"'This is the bottom.'

"He stood clear of the walls and lifted up his candle to examine the place.

"'This is the bottom,' he repeated.

"'Are you sure?' I called back.

"'Yes; I—'

"I saw his candle disappear, amid a crash. He called to me that it was all right, and to come down, and I cautiously followed, though I could not see his light anywhere. Soon I found out what was the matter. The miners had built a platform across the shaft, probably to prevent things from rolling down and my companion's weight had broken through the planks that had been placed in position so long before. He had only slid a few yards down the incline, and, barring a few scratches, was unhurt. A very little way below the old platform we struck the 200 foot level of the mine, and started off to explore the tunnels. After following a crooked old tunnel we came to a point where it forked.

"We entered the left hand tunnel, but found that it extended less than 20 yards. When we came to a standstill against the wall of rock Ben put his candle close to the wall to observe the grain of the porphyry. He made an exclamation of surprise. By the grain of the rock we had been traveling almost north, when we thought we were making good progress to the south. When or how we had got 'turned around' we could not tell, but there was no possibility of doubt about it.

"We lost no time in retracing our steps, but to our surprise when we came to the crooked tunnel again we saw the mouths of three drifts instead of two. We took the tunnel that led to the right and were gratified to find that it turned to the south after a few yards. It ended in an incline something like the one by which we had entered the mine. Down this went Ben, while I waited above, so as to be able to direct him back with my voice. Soon I heard him calling to me and I followed.

"'Look here,' said Ben, putting his candle close to a clammy timber.

"I looked and saw a chalk mark.

"'We've gone round in a circle somehow,' said Ben. 'There is the wheelbarrow you fell over. We had better follow our marks back and try it again some other time.'

"I was willing, and we walked back, occasionally stopping to see the marks on the timbers.

"'I didn't notice those things before, did you?' said my companion, as we passed half a dozen rusty picks that must have been lying there a decade, at least.

"I hadn't noticed them either, and soon we bumped our heads against an old lantern hanging from the top of the drift. We hadn't met that before. Then we saw more unfamiliar things, and we noticed that there was water beside the old car track, while the drifts by which we had come were all dry as a bone.

"We looked at one another and evidently the same thought passed through both our minds, but we kept on and soon our fears were realized. The tunnel ended in what had been, years before, a cooling station, a place where the miners ate their lunch and rested and cooled off when they were working in the neighboring drifts. We had followed some one else's chalk marks, and we had no idea of our whereabouts.

"'We can't get out the way we came,' said Ben, 'and no work is done in the upper levels, so what we've got to do is to get down as far as we can, and we're bound to run across some miners.' Then we began trying to find ourselves. We took the nearest tunnel and followed it until we came to a shaft with ladders in it. These ladders were crumbling and had evidently not been used for years, but we were not heavy and they did not break. Down we climbed to another level. This we followed as before.

Whenever we came to a shaft we threw a fragment of rock down to ascertain how deep it was. Then we would climb down as far as we could. We had just reached one level when a rushing sound broke the stillness. The noise startled us for an instant, but hurrying ahead we saw hundreds of rats coming out of a small tunnel at the mouth of which stood a moulderding old ore car.

"This cheered us, for we decided that men must frequent some place near there, or the rats, which in the mines live on the remains of the miners' lunches, could get nothing to eat. But though we hunted until we had to stop and cry again, we could find no one. Down an incline we went and struck a tunnel that had evidently been used more lately than the others. As we turned into it we saw a spark away off. Soon we saw that it was a candle carried by a miner. We let out a shout, but to our amazement and horror the minor dropped his candle and ran as if forty devils were chasing him. We hurried after him and picked up his candle, but he must have turned into some other drift, for we could not find him, and our weary search soon became as hopeless as before. We had by this time been in the mine a good many hours and had cried ourselves sick. No matter which way we turned, there was the same dead cold walls of rock. The passages were endless, they seemed to lead nowhere. We passed several old cooling stations and at last we got to one and stopped. We were utterly exhausted, and with all our misery choking us we swallowed some of our lunch, blew out our candles and, holding each other's hands, fell asleep.

"I remember that my last thought before I became unconscious was that a long time afterward they would find our bodies, and I think I even composed my face and arranged my limbs so as to make a more effective corpse. Nothing about this struck me as being funny. Indeed, I fell asleep crying. We must have slept a good many hours, and my next recollection is of our lying there together, sobbing, in the dense darkness. Suddenly I became conscious of a low, continued roar as of water running a long way off. My companion heard it and we listened, dully wondering what it could be. We finally lit a candle, ate the last of our lunch and started to find out. We had both been down the mines frequently before and had no fear of the darkness or the rats, so we went without hesitation. It was not hard to follow the noise. Along tunnels, down short upraises and up inclines we went until we struck our corridor. We followed on toward the noise. It was louder here, and as we advanced it grew into a perfect roar that filled the tunnel.

"Soon we ran into a wall of wood from behind which the noise come. We peered through a chink in the plank partition and saw a broad moving line. It was the cable that hoists the cage, and that is what made the noise.

We watched through the chink in the boards until we saw a cage loaded with rocks go up and then began to think how we could reach the point from which the cage had started. We knew that we were very far under ground, for the rocks that we threw down the frequent shafts splashed in the water at the bottom. It was not long before we found a deep shaft, and down that we clammered. As we neared the bottom we heard another rumbling—an ore car running along the tramway. We shouted as we went down the ladders and the carman answered our cry. Soon we were standing by him while he looked us over with wonder.

"'Where are we?' we both shouted, as soon as could speak.

"'This is the 1500-foot level of the Crown Point,' he answered.

"We had gone a mile and a half under the ground and nearly a third of a mile down. We were sick and bruised and hungry and our clothes were torn almost off of us. It was ten o'clock in the morning when we entered the old incline, and it was nearly 4 o'clock the next morning when the carman found us. In no time at all we had been fed and sent in charge of a miner on the cage to daylight again."

First Burglar—"Pard, the jig is up. No breaking into that bank to-night." Second Burglar—"What's the matter? Are the detectives onto us?" First Burglar—"No; I saw the president and cashier buying tickets for Montreal this morning."

STATE SENATOR.

This is Pocahontas' turn to furnish State Senator and our correspondent POCAHONTAS mentions in another column the name of Attorney C. F. Moore as the suitable man to lead the Democrats to victory in the coming election, which we most heartily endorse.

The republicans, next year, will make a greater effort than ever before to get control of the Legislature, and what we want and must have, is a man who will be a sure winner and who can be thoroughly relied on when elected, and we know of no other man who will more fully meet all the requirement than the above mentioned gentleman.

Floods.

Last year the Eastern States suffered most severely from the heavy floods, the far Western States having escaped almost entirely.

In 1890 the reverse promises to be the case. The heavy snows laid the foundation for over-swollen watercourses, and the copious warm rains of the past week have set the water to running in great volumes.

Reports of disasters have begun to arrive from different parts of Oregon, California, Washington, Colorado and elsewhere, and the danger ahead seems to be the greatest ever known from such a source since the settlement of that section. Many cities and towns are cut off by the water from all communication with the outside world, and immense loss of property and some loss of life is feared.

It is to be hoped that the fears so freely expressed are exaggerated, and that later news from the flooded country will be of a more cheerful cast.

A rumor comes up from Charleston that Judge Snyder, of the Supreme Court of Appeals, will soon tender his resignation. It is to be hoped that the rumor is without foundation as he is about the ablest jurist on the Supreme Bench. The reason assigned as that the work is too severe for him. Judge Snyder is now serving his second term. In the event of his resignation we know of no man we would rather see as his successor than Judge Homer A. Holt, of Lewisburg.—Mountain Herald.

The Roanoke Machine Works now employ 1,400 men. The pay roll last month amounted to over $55,000.

Mary L. C. Ross, was shot and killed in Staunton, a few days ago by Amos B. Grimble, and Beny Strother as accessary; all colored, and of a low character.

The date for the unveiling of the Lee monument at Richmond has been changed from the 15th to the 29th of May next, to suit the convenience of several distinguished gentlemen whose presence is considered important.

A great suit, arising out of Louisiana Lottery stock, and involving $1,000,000 has been begun against John A. Morris, owner of Morris Park. He will be defended by ex President Cleveland.

Frank P. Slavin has declined the Californian A. C.'s offer of a purse for him and Joe McAuliffe to box for. He says he does not wish to engage in any "catch match." He will wait until Sullivan and Jackson get through and then offer to meet the winner for $5,000 to $12,000 a side.

WASHINGTON LETTER

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, February, 14.—Mr. Reed's puppets, the republican members of the House, have humbly obeyed their masters orders and the new Rules have been adopted by the House. The democrats made manly protests against being robbed of their rights but their arguments did not cause a single republican to vote against the edict of the boss—nobody supposed they would. Now that the bars are down and that Congress practically consists of Speaker Reed and the Senate there is great rejoicing among that thriftly class of people who thrive on extravagant government appropriations, and if one may judge from the number of schemes now before Congress calling for large amounts of money which seem to have the endorsement of leading republicans, they have reason for rejoicing. If only one-fourth of the money asked for should be voted by Congress, the Treasury would be empty. The country may safely count on the democrats of the House to keep it posted on what is going on if they cannot check the proposed extravagance.

Senator Blair spoke four days on his educational bill this week. The opponents of this measure in the Senate have been working very quietly to defeat it, and now they are confidently claiming that a majority of the Senators are pledged to vote against it. In spite of this claim the general impression is that the bill will pass.

Col. Lamont, who was formerly Mr. Cleveland's private secretary, was in Washington this week for part of a day. He said his visit was a business one, but lots of people thought there might have been just a little politics mixed up with the business.

The democratic congressional campaign committee is practically complete, and further announcement as to its organization is not likely to be made until it is definitely known whether Senator Gorman will accept the chairmanship of the committee, which is now being urged upon him by the party leaders.

The hearings in the Ohio ballot box forgeries investigation, which were used by Ohio republicans to get even with each other on old scores, have been closed, all witnesses discharged and the committee adjourned subject to the call of its chairman. The last hearing was highly sensational. Foraker called Grosvenor a liar, and Wood stated that the forged document was prepared by Foraker, Hadden and himself. Wood has been detected in a good many lies, but there are lots of folks who believe he was pretty near the truth in this last statement.

How's this for paternal government? Bills have been introduced by republicans in both Houses to prohibit any changes being made in the boundaries of any Congressional district until after Congress shall have made the apportionment of Representatives on the returns of the census to be taken this year. If Congress, or a majority thereof, can make such a law there is no limit to what it may not do.

Representative Grimes, of Georgia, left a Washington hotel because a negro was seated at the same table with him. Public opinion here says Mr. Grimes did right.

Representative Blount's bill authorizing the Postmaster General to erect post-office buildings in all towns where the gross receipts exceed $3,000 a year is warmly approved by Mr. Wanamaker.

Senator Moody has introduced a bill providing for the erection of a post-office building in all towns of 4,000 population.

Senator Pierce has introduced a bill for an agricultural commission to investigate the causes for the present unsatisfactory condition of the agricultural interests.

The Postmaster General wants a postal telegraph system, embracing those cities having the free delivery system, to be established at once. He made a long argument in its favor before the House committee on Post offices this week. He believes it would be a great convenience and that it would be self sustaining.

Ex Representative Symes, of Colorado, is here opposing Secretary Windom's silver bill. The House committee in charge of the bill has invited Mr. Windom to appear before it and submit his views.

Another big republican editor has been provided for by the administration. Charles Emory Smith, editor of the Philadelphia Press goes to Russia as minister.

The Presidential proclamation opening the Sioux reservations in South Dakota to settlement, was sent out from the White House Monday afternoon.

The anti administration republican Senators did not make much of a showing when it came to a vote on the confirmation of Mr. Morgan, the Commissioner of Indian affairs. Only two of them voted against the confirmation.

The democratic leaders in the House are now patiently waiting to ascertain just what programme the republicans propose adopting now that they have everything their own way in that body.

Don't Go West, Young Man—Go East.

The unmarried women of Massachusetts are said to have $29,000,000 on deposit in the saving banks of the State.

Mrs. Harrison thinks the proper time for a girl to marry is when she is 25 years of age, but the general opinion is that a maiden should marry when she gets a good chance.

The next day we happened to step in his store and seeing him very busy, and a crowded store, we asked one of his customers, "Why did you come here to buy your goods?" and his answer was, "We seen his advertisement in THE TIMES." The merchant informed us that evening, that he had sold one hundred dollars worth of goods. Now, counting 25 per cent. profit (which of course all merchants ought to have on their goods) and three dollars for the ad. would leave him a clear gain of twenty-two dollars for the day's work, to say nothing of the good it will do him hereafter. Now, let us ask you does advertising pay?

The Next State Senator.

If the Democrats of this Senatorial District follow the custom heretofore established, of selecting their candidate, in rotation from each of the counties composing the district, the county last represented in the Senate, being entitled to the Candidate; Pocahontas' time to furnish the Candidate has arrived and we see no reason why our County should not have the next Senator. We have kept up our democratic majority, as well, if not better than any county in the Senatorial District. We have a large and growing county and our people deserve the same encouragement at the hands of the Democratic Party, for their fidelity, that has been extended to the other counties of the District, we have among us several available candidates, that would do honor to the District, but from among them all, we suggest the name of C. F. Moore, of Huntersville as the one best equipped in every respect to lead the Democratic Party of this District to victory next November, a gentleman affable in his manner, popular with the people, successful in his profession, ready in debate, well informed on the issues of the day and withall a sterling democrat, and we think no better or abler man could be selected, as our standard bearer in the coming contest.

Sending and receiving valentines seems to be the order of the day.

Mr. Uriah Philips one of our most influential farmers contemplates starting to the west in the near future.

We think if Jessie Gross had fell when he was on top of the benches making fun of the kind people of Brush Run, who were seeking religion during the meeting conducted by Rev. Hannah and Arbogast he would have broke his neck.

Madam Rumor has it that Prof. Jas. Varner will soon capture the bell of our burg.

We have a good prayer meeting every Thursday night, at our school house, conducted by Mr. Arretus Arbogast.

Mr. Jas. Varner paid Mr. James Gross a flying visit last Sunday.

We notice quite a lot of plowing has been done, over the county where we have been. That is right—farmers ought to put out more crops this year than before. Politics has but little to do with growing crops, and that is the only salvation for the people, since stock has gone to nothing. Pocahontas Co., ought to raise a hundred thousand bushels of oats this year.

Brother Ballengee preached his last sermon at Dunmore on the 16th for the conference year.

Kansas Philosophy.

There is no girl so homely that she does not enjoy her looking-glass.

Everybody thinks that other person's misfortunes is a punishment.

When a man get's angry at one he gets angry at all; when a woman gets angry at all she vents her wrath on just on one.

Our idea of a nice man is one who never has a daughter who is as pretty to him as his wife.

When a man quits smoking a pipe on the streets it is a sign that he is becoming ambitious.

Woman's hand may be pale and deligate, but she can pick up a hotter plate than a man.

Poor woman! Eve was the only woman of her sex who did not have her garments made fun of.

What is a Model Wife.

A model wife is the woman in whom the heart of her husband doth safely trust.

She is a woman who looks after his household, and makes her hospitality a delight to him and not a burden.

Who has learned that a soft answer will turn away wrath.

Who keeps her sweetest smiles and most loving words for her husband.

Who is confident in sorrow or in joy, and who does not feel the necessity of explaining her private affairs to her neighbors.

Who respects the rights of her husband and children, and in return has due regard paid her.

Who knows that the strongest argument is her womanliness and so she cultivates it.

Who is sympathetic in joy or in grief, and who finds work for her hands to do.

Who makes friends and keeps them.

Who is not made bitter by trouble, but who strengthens and sweetens under it.

Who tries to conceal the faults of her husband rather than blazen them forth to an uninterested public.

The woman whose life book has love written on every page.

Who makes a home for a man—home in house and in heart. A home that he is sure of, a home that he is full of love, presided over by one whose price is above rubies. She is the model wife.

Visitor—Well, Doctor, how's business?

Doctor—Good. Got two new cases in the next house.

Visitor—What! "La grippe?"

Doctor—No. Beer.

"I want to send a telegram to my husband," said an excited young woman, who came hurrying into a Western Union telegraph office the other morning.

"Very well," replied the operator in attendance. "There are some blanks, and, of course, the briefer it is the less it will cost to send it."

"Oh, I know that," she replied, and then she wrote:

DEAR GEORGE:—I've something too dreadful to tell you, but please don't get excited, dear, for it can't be helped now, and baby and I are perfectly safe. I don't know how it ever happened and cook says she don't know, and none of us can account for it, but the house caught fire last night and burned to the ground. Just think of it! Did you ever hear of anything so perfectly dreadful in all of your life! I'm half wild over it. But please keep calm, dear. Baby and I are safe, and most of the things were saved, and you musn't think of anything but how much worse it might have been. What if baby had been burned! O, George! don't it make you shudder to think of it? But the dear little darling is perfectly safe, and of course we went right straight to mamma's, and you can't think how frightened she was until she knew we were safe. And I know just how shocked you'll be, you poor, dear boy, but as baby and I are safe you oughtn't to mind anything else. I can't imagine how the fire started. Can you? Do you suppose some one set the house on fire? Oh, it's too dreadful to think of. Come right home. MAMIE.

P. S.—Remember that baby and I are safe. M.

"There," she said, as she handed the seven blanks she had written to the operator, "I suppose it might be condensed a little."

"Yes, I think it might," he replied, as he took a fresh blank and wrote:

"Our house burned to the ground last night. All safe. Come home. MAMIE."

BOWSER RUNS THE KITCHEN.

At the supper table the other evening, when Mr. Bowser complained of the biscuit and tea, and called attention to the general look of dilapidation which the table presented, I felt called upon to reply:

"Well, as you know, I have been feeling very miserable for three or four days and this house girl seems to be the poorest one that I ever had. She has no order or system, no taste or skill, and I won't keep her a minute after I can get around."

"If this is her style I'll go out and discharge her."

"Wait. If she was to go now you'd have to cook your own meals."

"That wouldn't hurt me any. I'll go out and ask her what she means by such conduct, anyhow."

"But I wish you wouldn't. She may flare up and leave us in the lurch."

"Let her flare! When the time comes that we can't boss our own house we'll leave it!"

"Mr. Bowser, please let the girl alone for me to deal with," I entreated.

"I'll just speak a few words to her you know," he replied, and as I went into the sitting room he went into the kitchen.

In about two minutes I heard a crash of crockery and the bang of a door, followed by the sound of the girl's feet on the back stairs, and five minutes later she came down with her bundle and skipped out without a word to me! Mr. Bowser came in soon after that, coat off, sleeves rolled up and a roller towel tied around him, and he explained:

"I simply asked her if she thought this house was a saw mill, and she called me a mastodon and flew for her bundle. Is she a fair specimen of the help you have had to deal with?"

"Yes."

"Well, you and all the other house keepers have my deepest sympathy. I used to think it was your fault that so many girls came and went but I want to apologize and take it all back."

"But, what shall we do?"

"Do? Why, I'll run the kitchen until after breakfast and then get a girl."

After he had been at work for a few minutes I crawled out to see how things were going. He was washing dishes. He had the tea pot, butter dish, napkin rings, two pie tins and the crockery all heaped together in a dish pan, and while he was washing them with a dish towel he was wiping them on one of baby's old skirts taken from the hamper in the stairway. There w[ere] streaks of dish water clear [to] his heels and a dozen new [grease] spots had appeared on floor [illegible], but he insisted that I go [ba]ck and leave him alone, and [had n]o instructions to give. He [illegible] thing done up in half an [hour, an]d when he came in to sit [illegible] said:

"[Every]thing out there is as slick [as a] [illegible], and breakfast is all plan[ned]. That girl would have been [illegible] around until 10 o'clock [bef]ore she had her dishes done. I'd [illegible] in your place a month. [illegible] some of 'em wonder why [illegible] ever born?" [illegible] every house has just such [illegible]. [illegible] you women ought to [illegible] together to protect your[selves]. [illegible] are you going to have for [breakfa]st?"

"[Nev]er you mind, Mrs. Bowser. If I don't get you the best breakfast you have seen in a year I'll give up that I don't know nothing about a house."

About midnight I heard him muttering in his sleep:

"Take two eggs—saleratus—five minutes—greased rag—one tablespoonful to each person."

It usually takes me all of twenty minutes to get Mr. Bowser out of bed in the morning, and the task is never accomplished without resort to fiction as to the lateness of the hour. On this particular morning he sliped out before I was awake and he had been working in the kitchen a full hour before I got down. No man can be made to believe that there is a right and a wrong way to sheets or table cloths. Mr. Bowser had set the table just as any other man would. The cloth was wrong-side-out, the teaspoons in the celery dish, the sugar-bowl running over, and the meat platters and bread plates had changed duties. Some of his slices of bread were two inches thick, and some almost as thin as paper, and two of them bore indisputable proofs that he had cut his finger while cutting his bread.

He requested me to sit down while he brought in the meal. He had his cut finger in a rag, black on his nose, flour on his ears, and his face had the color peculiar to red paint. He also went lame in his left leg, caused, as I afterwards ascertained, by the rolling pin falling on his foot. Where he had everything on the table, he looked around him with a self-satisfied air and proceeded to do the honors. Poor Mr. Bowser! He had put the steak into a spider without butter or grease, and it was as black as coal and rather more tasteless. When he poured the coffee the grounds insisted on filling half the cup, and the eggs he had fried in some rancid lard the girl had set away could not be approached nearer than two feet. He had attempted to bake some potatoes, but they were hardly warmed through. In his goodness of heart he had toasted me a piece of bread, and when it fell into the ashes he had wiped off as much foreign substance as he could with the brush-broom used about the stove. I tried hard to keep my face straight, but my feelings finally got away with me, and Mr. Bowser looked up with an injured air and said:

"You never cooked a better meal in all your life—you nor any of your relations for a thousand years back!"

Just then I saw that he had used a pie tin for the butter dish, and I had to laugh again.

"Look here, Mrs. Bowser!" he shouted, as he bobbed up and almost overturned the table, "this thing has gone too far—too far! I see now where the trouble lies. I see now why no girl will stay with you."

"But this last one was willing to stay."

"Yes, and what did you do? Degraded her in her own estimation until self respect obliged her to quit."

"You went out and blew her up."

"I did! I went out and blew! And who asked me to do it?"

"No one."

"That settles it, Mrs. Bowser,—settles it right here and now! It's the last meal I'll ever cook for you, and we have had our last girl! I see why they can't stay. I see what's the matter with you and the other women who employ help, and I won't be a party to it."

"I asked you to let the girl alone."

"You did! Never! You begged of me to go out and throw her over the alley fence, and her bundle after her, and what must that poor girl's feelings be at this moment! I now go. I may return or I may not. If not you have the consolation of knowing what drove me from my own domicile."

But he returned. All husbands return. They begin to feel ashamed of themselves before they are clear of the gate, and the next hour is spent in fishing for an excuse to return a quarter of an hour earlier than usual. A girl happened along just after he left, and I hired her, and he hasn't even referred to the subject since.

Altogether too Fast.

As the train left Dayton, south bound, the conductor came into the smoking car with a cry of, "Tickets, please!" and as there was only one fresh passenger he walked directly up to him. This new arrival was from the farm, and in nothing of a hurry.

"What's up, Kurnel?" he asked as the conductor halted before him.

"Ticket, sir!"

"Yes. Is she on time?"

"Yes."

"Going right to Cincinnati?"

"Yes. Ticket, if you please."

"I had a ticket, but—— Say how's wheat looking along the line?"

"Give me your ticket."

"Wonder where I put it? Been much rain between here and Hamilton this month? Feller was telling me yesterday that he never—"

"I am in a hurry, sir!" exclaimed the conductor.

"Shoo! Haven't got any hay out at the other end of the line, have you? I got caught once last week, and me'n Bill had to work like like nailers to beat a thunder storm."

"Have you got a ticket?"

"Of course."

"Then hand it over at once! I can't fool away my time here!"

"Shoo! Well, here's the ticket, and I want a receipt for it. Feller in such a hurry as you might die suddenly. Lands! but what a hired man you would make for a week or two! Never had one who was in a hurry. Say, if you—"

But the conductor was gone, the countyman turned to a passenger with a look of disgust on his face, and continued:

"That's the way with these monopolies. They not only want all your money, but they won't treat you decent after they git it. Reckon I'll drop in on the boss of the road when I get to town and let him know that such conduct don't go down with a free-born American."

He (somewhat suspiciously)—You say you never loved loved anybody but me? Ha! is that true, Maud?

She—Harry, your looks terrify me! Have—have I been too bold in allowing you to kiss me so much this evening?

He—No, Maud, but you kiss like an old hand.

"Where do the poor grades of stock go?"

"It is made into smoking tobacco and exported. Nearly all our inferior grades of stock are made into smoking tobacco and sent to the Continent."

"Don't home consumers use inferior grades?"

"Oh, yes, but not so much so."

Jones—For heaven's sake, Robinson, look here! That boy has broken through the ice.

Robinson—So he has! What in the world are we going to do for him, Jones? (To shivering and exhausted boy.) Keep cool, bub! keep cool!

Mr. Fainwed—Then you refuse to marry me?

Mrs. Mainchance—For the present I must. My husband is in good health and we are the best of friends.

Mr. Fainwed—And you can give me no encouragement?

Mrs. Mainchance—I will keep your address and if a vacancy should occur I will drop you a line.

(N. B.—This happened in Chicago, of course.)

Boombeimer—Vot vill you gif me for dis ferry olt silfer toller?

Englesheimer—Sigsty sents.

Boombeimer—Vot? It vos a goot toller, aind't it?

Englesheimer (hesitatingly)—Vell, it loogs lige a goot von.

Boombeimer—Den vot for you say sigsty sents?

Englesheimer—Vell, ve hef a pig stog on hant alretty—unt den, you see, you are dryin' to sell it.

Willie was bashful, and sat on the chair with a care which was far from being any suggestion of studied grace. His mother had found him in the pantry with his fingers strongly suggestive of intimate acquaintance with jam and marmalade.

"What is the matter Willie," asked his sister, who happened into the room.

"Mamma spanked me," he said, plaintively.

"What for?"

"For—for fishing in her preserves."

Mr. Billus (looking over his expense account)—Maria we spent exactly $50 more than our income last year. We've got to retrench.

Mrs. Billus—It wasn't my fault, John. I didn't lose $75 on the election, nor pay out $40 in club dues, nor spend $65 for cigars, nor run through with $150 in three days at the races, nor indorse a note for $200 for a mere acquaintance and lose it, nor—"

Mr. Billus (still looking through the expense account)—None of these things account for that $50. By Jove! Here it is! "Subscription to pastor's salary. $50!" Maria we can't stand that! The preacher will have to get along without anything from me this year.

"Boy!" he said to the newsboy who had opened the door of the shop to yell "Papers!" "boy, you vhas a shwindler, and I doan' buy some more papers of you."

"What did I do?"

"You sells me a paper last night, and I took him home und hunt all ofer und doan' find dot message."

"What message?"

"Dot message by der President."

"Why, the President don't have a message but once a year. It came out long ago."

"Ish dot so? He comes outs und I doan' see him. Und he doan' come no more?"

"Not for a good while yet."

"Vhell, dot explains, and I beg pardon. You can beat me a paper some more, und if he doan' had some message in maybe I can find if some pody hang himself or vhas killed. No President's message, eh? What vhas dot President doing all der time? Why do we pay him fifty thousand dollars a year?"

EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Entered at the Post-office at Huntersville, W. Va., as second class matter.

Huntersville, W. Va.

February 27, 1890.

Jacob Schoop and Thomas Cole were hanged in Philadelphia on the 20th inst., for murder.

In St. Louis, a man who is believed to be deeply implicated in the Cronin murder has been arrested.

W. S. Hopkins, was hanged for the murder of his wife and mother-in-law at Bellefonte, Pa, on the 20 inst.

Sam Pratt killed W. H. Thompson in Wayne Co., last week. The trouble was caused by a division fence.

Sport John L. Sullivan is 5 ft. 10½ in. tall, Jake Kilrain is 5 feet 11½ inches, Peter Jackson is about 5 feet and Charley Mitchell 5 feet 10 inches.

J. B. Kelley, arrested in St Louis as a much wanted Cronin criminal, turns out to be nothing worse than a book agent, and the detectives are duly crestfallen.

The New York Herald paid the widow of Russell Wright $24,631 damages for libel, said to be the largest amount ever paid in America for libel, and the largest in the world except that paid by the London Times to Mr. Parnell.

The Indiana Prohibitionists have nominated a full State ticket, and declared in favor of the exemption from taxation of clothes and other necessaries of life. Tobacco comes under the head of such necessaries in Indiana.

At a log rolling in Wayne County, on the 20th inst., Wade Thompson, a notorious desperado, was struck and killed with a club by one Sam Pratt. The quarrel was over some trivial matter. Pratt was arrested, but escaped. Thompson was one of the murderers of Alonzo McCoy, during the Hatfield-McCoy troubles.

Wm. Miller, tried at Lexington, Va., last week for the killing of Dr. J. Z. Walker, at Brownsburg, Va., last November, has been acquitted. The verdict gives the most universal satisfaction, and it is met with approval on every hand. When the case had been disposed of the Commonwealth moved to take up the other cases, and the Court decided to set them for the April term. The counsel for the defence asked for bail in the cases of George and David Miller and John Reese. The Attorney for the Commonwealth raising no objection, these prisoners were bailed at $1,500 each to appear at the April term, and they were set free under bonds.

George Wilcox, who recently died in West Franklin, Pa., lived and died in the Democratic faith. His will, just filed in the Bradford County court, is a somewhat remarkable document. He left a stated sum to his grandsons on condition that they support the Democratic ticket, State and national. His granddaughters, in order to inherit any of the old man's wealth must either marry Democrats or remain single. Should any one fail to comply with the provisions of the will their amount shall be divided among those who remain faithful. In the event of all failing to listen to the requests then their interest in the estate is forfeited, and the entire amount goes to the Democratic National Committee. There is not much danger that the boys will ever be anything than Democrats.

Ed. Smith, the Dever heavy weight has challenged Kilrain.

John Jacob Aster died in New York on the 22nd inst., of heart failure. He was one of America's richest men.

In the Southern Athletic Club in New Orleans on the 17th inst., Corbett bested Kilrain in six rounds. Kilrain agreed to knock Corbett out in six rounds for a purse of $3,500, of which $2,500 was to go to the winner. Corbett out-fought Kilrain at every point. Cleary whipped Mike Smith in two rounds. Bezniah bested Johnson in four rounds.

Kilrain says he is not satisfied with tonight's contest, as all in fighting was barred. Corbett having the longest reach naturally could tip and get away. He would like to box him with five ounce gloves. He will fight in a club for a suitable purse to a finish, winner to take all.

A Quintuple wedding took place a few days ago at a little church in Daviess County, Ky. All the parties were friends, two of them being sisters. They had intended getting married on dates near together, and the priest hearing this, suggested that they all be united at the one time. The five brides, all dressed alike, went in one carriage and the five grooms in another. There were ushers, but no bridesmaids. All took their stations before the altar, and after an unusually long and impressive ceremony had been gone through with nuptial high mass was celebrated and the kneeling couples blessed. A grand reception was then given the young couples, and afterwards they went to their respective homes.

Wayside Note.

It was your correspondents pleasure to visit portions of Bath and Highland about Valentine time.

Such beautiful days in winter no one remembers ever seeing even the the oldest inhabitant.

Some time was spent in the hospitable home of Col. D. V. Ruckman. This enterprising and public spirited gentleman is greatly pleased with his success in raising Japanese Buckwheat. He sowed between four and five bushels last cropping time and realized over three hundred bushels.

Capt. Gilmore his neighbor sowed seven pecks, and gathered one hundred bushels. He believes had it not been for the turkeys, there would have been fifteen or twenty bushels more.

These gentlemen feed Buckwheat to their sheep and hogs, and their stock thrive well on it, mixed with oats it is an excellent feed for horses.

For table use it is as good if not better than the common variety. Those of your readers, that have not tried it, would do well to make further inquiries about this remarkable cereal, the Japanese Buckwheat.

W. T. P.

A Card.

Ed. Times: In your last issue under a head of "Buckeye News," one Lucian says: "It is supposed that the government sent out this man upon the suggestion of Mr. H. S. Rucker, to see if he could find sufficient cause for the removal of some of the Democratic Post Masters," referring to the visit of a Post Office Inspector to this County. Now Mr. Lucian either contributes to your columns the suppositions of a very ignorant club, such as does not exist at Buckeye, or he has no regard for that injunction which says: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." I have never undertaken to remove any Post Master in this County, but have aided in sustaining one or two and actually they were Democrats. The mode of having removals, is by applying for the appointment of another, and having the application endorsed by the Representative in Congress or elect. I am persuaded that Mr. Lucian knows more of the real object of the Post Office Inspector's visit than he has divulged to the public. Perhaps Mr. Lucian would like to know whether or not he had impressed the P. O. I. so that he would report to the department all right at Buckeye. Perhaps Mr. Lucian was about the Buckeye Post Office about the time when he had no right to be, and perhaps his conscience makes him feel uneasy about the result of the visit of said P. O. I. If I wish Mr. Lucian removed I will have no trouble in procuring it.

I am yours &c,
H. S. Rucker.

HOME NEWS

—Mud, Mud, Mud.

—Rain, Rain, Rain.

—County Court next Tuesday.

—Drummers are still plentiful.

—Some body bring us 4 lbs. and 25 cents worth of nice butter.

—Eggs and butter and other fruit seem to be scarce around here.

—Uriah Bird, Esq., of Mill Point was in to see us Monday.

—Knapp's creek "got full" last Tuesday night.

—L. W. Herold, Esq., of Frost, was in town Tuesday.

—Don't forget THE TIMES office is head quarters for nice job printing.

—Rice Moore, Esq., of Dunmore came to our city Monday and returned Tuesday.

—Mrs. Henry Sharp, of Douthard's creek has been on the sick list for a few days past.

—Our Clerk informs us that the marriage license market has been on the decline since the wet weather set in.

—Rev. W. T. Price, preached in the Presbyterian church Sunday night, and made us a pleasant call Monday.

—Mr. J. W. Neff, of Anthony's creek and Miss Julia A. Littlepage, were married near Ronceverte, on the 12th inst.

—The sickly green stamp, about which there has been so much fool talk has gone the way of all the earth, and is succeeded by a smaller one of dark carmine, which is about the color of a half ripened toper nose.

—Let quality, not quanity, be the test of a medicine. Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the concentrated extract of the best and purest ingredients. Medical men everywhere recommend it as the surest and most economical blood medicine in the market.

—John Hickman, of Davis, Tucker Co., was arrested at Keyser last week. John was wanted on several charges. His first trial will be in the U. S. Federal Court at Clarksburg, for breaking open the mail between this place and Dunmore a few years ago.

—The great majority of so-called cough cures do little more than impair the digestive functions and create bile. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, on the contrary, while it cures the cough, does not interfere with the functions of either stomach or liver.

—A couple of Mormon preachers have been around here for a few days, and we understand preached on Beaver creek Sunday. Look here Mess. Mormon preachers you don't want to hang out around our burg much. We are generally pretty quiet sort of people, if let alone, but if you get us raised we are a terror; its true eggs are pretty scarce, but the creek isn't far off, and our farmers raise an abundance of feathers and tar.

—Use Hall's Vegetable Sicillian Hair Renewer and your thin gray locks will [illegible] up and be restored to their youthful color, vigor, and beauty.

Locals from Frost.

Mumps are making their way in to our small city, also hooping cough has been raging in our town.

Miss Myrtle Hannah has gone to Edray to attend the school taught by Mr. Walter Anderson.

We are sorry to say, Mr. Forrest Herold is quite ill at this writing.

Miss Effie Sharp is visiting friends and relatives at this place.

Mr. Lockard Burkett is preparing to paint Mess. Hannah & Hamilton's store house.

The merchants are out of writing paper. I suppose we'll have to quit writing or go to THE TIMES office for it.

Misses Minnie McElwee and Mollie Smith spent Wednesday with Mrs. J. B. Hannah.

Drummers are numerous in town this week.

Mrs. L. W. Herold, has been on the sick list for some time past.

Calvin Stuart, (col.) moved his family to Huttonsville this week, where he expects to make his future home.

Success to THE TIMES.

WILLIE LEE.

Locals from Hillsboro.

Plenty of rain and mud.

We still have several cases of La Grippe.

Mr. J. H. Overholt, of Frankford, paid our town a flying visit last week.

Miss Elizabeth Cochran, of Lost Creek, is visiting her relatives and many friends.

Mr. Newton Mann, of Fairmount, Ill., is spending the winter with his sister Miss M. N. McCoy.

Several drummers were in town last week. We presume the Spring trade is looking up.

Miss Ada Williams, of Locust, has enrolled as a pupil of the H. T. School.

Wonder why G. and W., like to go to mill every other day.

The Hillsboro Division Sons of Temperance, will give a public meeting Saturday night March 1st. The public are cordially invited to attend. They have given several public meetings and they are well worth attending.

BETH & THOS.

Hillsboro Happenings No. 2

Justitia has been for some time contending with la grippe, so that she has been absent for some time from your noted columns.

Dr. McClintic, of Edray, is moving to Hillsboro, and will be the practicing physician of this section. Success to him.

Misses Duffie Marshall Addie Williams, Villa, Cilla and Pearl Marshall, Willie and Sallie Houltz, have been enrolled as pupils at the H. T. School.

Misses Verdie and Alice Clark, returned some weeks ago from their schools.

The ladies of Hillsboro and vicinity made a big sewing at the Methodist parsenage last Wednesday, 18th inst., and were amply rewarded by the enjoyment of the elegant dinner.

The whooping cough, is going through this vicinity. Old and young are its victims.

The Baltimore Conference is rapidly approaching and soon our faithful pastor will have to bid adue to friends and enter upon the duties of another place. May God's richest blessing attend him where ever he goes.

JUSTITIA.

Driftwood Doings.

Samuel Gay, of Edray was in our burg last week.

The grippe has been prevailing here.

Mr. S. A. Meeks, who has been visiting in Highland returned home accompanied by Mrs. Asberry Hiner.

Wm. Pritchard and Craig Bird are hauling lumber for G. M. Sheets.

Wm. McCloud lost a fine horse last week.

Mr. A. K. Dysard starts for Greenbrier next week for the purpose of renting his fathers house.

We all agree with the Dunmore correspondent as to the road around Snake Den, as it would be a great convenience to the people on this side of the river.

Some thieving is going around here. Mr. Howard Meeks lost some meat and corn.

Rev. W. T. Price will preach here on monday night the 3rd of March.

The church at Clover Creek came very near being burned last Sunday.

The sick are Mrs. Meeks, Boyd Meeks, Asbury Hines and little Eva McGlaughlin.

COLA.

Douthard's Creek Items.

A little more snow, but not enough for the boys to take their best girls sleigh-riding.

Mr. James Price, Jr., from Marlinton, W. Va., who has been attending a Medical school in Baltimore, M. D., stopped on our creek over night, on his return home.

One Mr. Reynolds from Roanoke city was stopping at H. White's last week.

Mrs. Henry Sharp is on the sick list.

Mr. J. H. Buzzard, we are glad to say, is again able to attend to his public work. Perhaps it would be better to call him "Our Joe" as we notice he has this brand on the brow band of his mules bridle.

Mr. Chas. Steinmyer, has finished his work and has gone to Dunmore to find out which one of the girls sent him that nice valentine. Guess he had better ask Swecker who did it.

We learn there is a great deal of sickness on Anthony's Creek, in Greenbrier County.

We also learn that Mr. C. May from, the head of Anthony's Creek, is going to bring his bride home one day this week. Lookout boys he will bring her through Huntersville about next Friday at 1 or 2 oclock, p. m.

Miss Effie Sharp has gone to Frost to take music lessons.

Miss Ida White who is attending school at Dr. S. P. Patterson's spent Saturday and Sunday at home.

Mr. Editor come up and we will hunt a mess of maple sugar.

Buckeye News.

Mr. H. H. McClintic, on entering his stable last Thursday morning was surprised to find one of his best horses dead. It seems the horse had tried to roll and succeeded in turning over once, thus drawing the rope with which he was tied, so tight around his neck that he choked to death immediately. He was valued at $125.

Wm. Newcomer and family passed through our town last Thursday en route for Ronceverte, where they expect to make their future home.

There were two Mormon preachers in our neighborhood last week. They held services in the M. P. Church last Wednesday evening. Oweing to the inclemency of the weather and perhaps other reasons but very few attended. There is no more believers in mormonism now than formerly.

Our people hail with joy the proposed change in the Mail Route from Lewisburg to Huntersville. Although our people do not get a big amount of mail they like to get the little they do get in less than three days from the time it leaves Ronceverte.

John Buckley and Geo. McCollum ran two rafts from here during the freshet of last week for W. H and H. H. McClintic.

Driscol's drive passed here last Saturday at noon.

Miss Delilah Kellison has returned home from visiting her sister at Clover Lick.

Miss Sharp of Bath Co., Va., is the guest of G. W. McKeever.

Mr. Claiburn McNeill is quite sick at this writing but we hope his sickness is not serious.

Mr. N. C. McNeill is still not able to be about.

Mr. D. P. Barnes wears a broad smile all the time lately and to all appearances is the happiest young man in the neighborhood. She must like him.

Green Bank Items.

Mr. J. L. Jones, of Palo Alto, Va. spent Saturday in town, as the guest of Dr. J. P. Mooman.

Rev. Mr. Ballengee has been suffering from a severe attack of La Grippe the past week. It was regretted by himself and congregation that he was unable to preach on Sunday, as it was his last regular appointment for the Conference year.

Mr. J. H. Curry, Sr., though very feeble, is somewhat improved since last week. J. H. Curry, Jr., from near Mill Point, is on a visit to his sick father.

Mr. W. A. Gladwell, made a flying trip to Staunton last week and returned Friday.

The Ladies Missionary Society of Green Bank, will hold their regular anniversary on Thursday night the 27th. All are cordially invited and a pleasant time is anticipated.

We hear of several weddings in the near future.

PAULINA.

Dunmore Doings.

Rain, mud and wet weather.

Still the grippe prevails, Mrs. C. B. Swecker has been confined to the house for three weeks with it.

Well we believe this is J. C. Kinport's flood. He said when the drive started she must go and she goes, with McGinty on the front end.

Miss Lena McGlaughlin has closed her school near Huntersville, and has commenced a subscription school near the McGlaughlin school house.

Big Bill and Jim Bird cut one hundred and twenty-five thousand feet of cherry lumber on Elk for Mr. Brow.

Just the Chance he Wanted.

"Talk about being broke," said he, "reminds me of a time when I was very badly broke, so much so, indeed, that I was in debt. I owed everybody, and, although I had told all of my creditors exactly how I was fixed and promised them I would make good as soon as I got money, they seemed determined that I should not rest a moment in peace. As I said before, I didn't have anything, and of course as the old saying goes, they could not get blood out of a stone.

"One of my creditors, a big fat, strong shoemaker, was particularly obnoxious, for he was at my house presenting his bill three and four times a day, and often the same number of times during an evening.

"He made me tired, and I puzzled my brain for a scheme to get rid of him.

"You know if a man waits, and is looking for an opportunity, the opportunity will often come, and so my chance to get even with him came at last.

"I knew that he was a coward at heart, and I resolved to make him so afraid that he would run out of my house and never come in it again. This morning that I referred to he came as usual and presented his bill. I was busy in a room I had fixed up as a sort of 'den,' as it were, and the landlady sent him in there to find me.

"'Well, sir, what is it?' I asked, as he came [illegible]

"'I have come for the amount of my bill,' he replied.

"'And for the nine hundred and twenty-eighth time,' said I calmly, 'I shall be obliged to tell you that I haven't the necessary funds to liquidate that bill.'

"'Very well, sir,' he answered. 'Then I shall be obliged to inform you that I shall sit down here and wait until the bill is paid.'

"'Very good,' said I quietly, but, to tell you the truth, I was highly elated, for here was just the opportunity I had been looking for.

"He sat down and placed his hat on the table. When he had done this I called to the landlady and said: "Mrs. Robbins, I am at home to nobody to-day and do not want to be disturbed under any circumstances. You may come in to-morrow morning and mail what letters you find here on my writing desk." Then I closed and locked the door, and stripping up some billiard cloth I had, stuffed it into every crack, leaving no place where air could get into the room or out. Then I drew up a long legal-looking document, which I labeled 'My will,' which I took good care that the shoemaker should see, and after writing a few notes I went to the chandelier and turned on all four burners. All the while previous to this the big shoemaker had no doubt thought that I was bluffing him, but when I turned on the gas I could see that he was beginning to feel nervous.

"I arranged everything neatly in the room and then sat down calmly and waited for him to weaken. The gas was escaping rapidly and the room was fast becoming filled with it. I could feel my head swim, but I would not give in. All of a sudden he jumped up and cried: 'I did not come here to be murdered,' and, making a rush, jumped through the window, taking sash and all with him. It was about 20 feet from the ground, but when he landed he started off as if a mad bull were after him, and I never saw him or his bill, for—I can't help it if you don't believe me. It's the truth, and if you come up here to morrow I'll show you the man himself, and you can ask him if it isn't so."

Smith is a joker and not long ago when a man threatened to knock him all to pieces, he remarked:

"I beg your pardon; you mean all to Smithereens."

When you can climb through a barbed wire fence in good shape with your overcoat on, you may then hope to run for office without being held up before the world as a scoundrel.

Mrs. Figg—Isn't there any way to get rid of that young Jinx who keeps calling on Clara without positively insulting him?

Mr. Figg—Why, certainly. Just give him the baby to hold the next time he comes.

Miss Sadie Pulltrigger (roguishly)—Colonel, I'm afraid you have an awful lazy horse. He stops at every large tree he comes to.

Col. Whipshaw (of rattlesnake ranche)—He ain't lazy; that's jess a habit he's got into, Miss Pulltrigger. I rode that hoss to five different lynchin' bees last week. No wonder he stops when he comes to a tree!

"Pardon me, madam," said the studious looking man in the sixth row of seats as he leaned forward at the fall of the curtain on the first act and spoke politely to the lady sitting in front of him, "but I beg you will not remove your hat."

"Sir!" she exclaimed, flushing with indignation.

"I fancied from the motion of your hands," he resumed with the utmost suavity, "that you were about to remove it. Please do not. Oblige me, my dear madam, by keeping it on."

"You are grossly impertinent, sir!" said the lady, sharply.

"I beg your pardon, madam," he replied, with great earnestness. "I am only a poor inventor, and I am making a drawing of your hat as a design for a World's Fair tower."

"Your time has come," said a physician, speaking to an old Georgian, who lay stretched out on a bed.

"Air you shore, doc.?"

"Yes."

"Ain't no chance fur you to be wrong, is thar?"

"None whatever. You'll be dead by sundown."

"Shore 'nuff, now?"

"Yes, I tell you."

"Doc, you ain't trying ter get off a joke on me, air you?"

"No, I never joke a dying man."

"Wall, then, I reckon I'm gone; but I wish I'd knowed it a week ago."

"Think you would have been better prepared?"

"Yep; a heap better."

"It's not too late to pray, if that will do you any good."

"I don't know nothin' about that; but ef I'd a knowed last week what I know now, why I wouldn't er bought that thar hoss. I'd a tuck the money and had some fun with it. Cousin had a rollin' time on that $40. Cousin bought licker enough to swim a hog in. That's the way with this here world. A man never knows nothin' till it's too late."

DEATH OF MARY.

If I had thought thou couldst have died,
I might not weep for thee;
But I forgot when by thy side,
That thou couldst mortal be;
It never through my mind had passed
That time would e'er be o'er—
When on thee should look my last,
And thou shouldst smile no more.

And still upon that face I look,
And think 'twill smile again;
And still the thought I will not brook
That I must look in vain;
But when I speak thou dost not say
What thou ne'er left'st unsaid,
And now I feel as well I may,
Sweet Mary—thou art dead!

Could I but keep thee as thou art,
All cold and all serene,
I still might press thy silent heart
And where thy smiles have been,
Whilst even thy chill bleak corse I have
Thou seemst still mine own:
But there—I lay thee in thy grave,
And I am now alone.

I do not think, where'er thou art,
Thou hast forgotten me;
And I, perhaps, may soothe this heart
By thinking still on thee.
Yet there was round thee such dawn
Of light, ne'er seen before,
As fancy never could have drawn,
And never can restore.

A MAN'S FOLLY.

Van Lennox sat in his office one cold wintry night, his thoughts busy, quite blissfully occupied, for one week from that day would be his wedding day, and he would be the happiest of men.

Lenore Arden was a lovely girl and quite a belle in the pretty town of Scranton, where she had lived all her life. The bridegroom elect sat wrapped in profound meditation, building his castle in the air with all the usual disregard to cost, which characterizes young people. He was a flourishing lawyer, and the dainty little home which he had just built for his bride was ready, and the the future seemed all colour de rose.

"I will close the office now," he said at length, rising to his feet, "for I shall only have time to go up to the hotel and get my dinner, then pack my belongings all ready for the early morning train. Ah!"—stopping short at a sound of a familiar whistle—"there comes the postman. What can he have for me?"

He threw open the office door, and a moment later he stood all alone in the room with a letter in his hand—a letter addressed to Van [Lenn]ox, Esq., in a strange, cramp[ed, un]familiar hand. He swiftly [tore i]t open.

"[Mr]. Van Lennox," it said, "you [illegible] that you are on the high-road [illegible]. You believe that you [liv]ed for yourself alone, and [illegible] thought never occurs to you [illegible] you may be only a miserable [illegible]. Lenore Arden loves you, but [illegible] money better. Remem[ber] [illegible] words, 'There's many a slip ['twixt] cup and lip,' and old Mont[gomery], the millionaire, is paying [his] affianced bride very close at[tention] [illegible] I warn you. 'A word to [the wise]' [illegible] etc. Of course, you will [illegible] my warning, but the day [illegible] when you will remember [illegible] to your sorrow."

[illegible] was all—no signature, no [illegible] only those cruel, stinging [words] [illegible], which for a moment stunned [him] [illegible] with the force of a [blow].

[illegible] crushed the letter into his [illegible], his face pale as death, and, [pouring] a glass of water from a caraf[e on] the table, drank it eager[ly].

"I will go home," he muttered, slowly. "How can I believe one word of that cowardly letter? It is true that I have not heard from Lenore lately with regularity, and her letters have been short and unsatisfactory, but her excuse has been a good one. She has been so occupied with preparations for the coming event. I will pay no heed to that cowardly blow struck in the dark. I will go to Scranton to-morrow, as agreed, and when I have told Lenore all we will have a merry laugh at my expense."

He put on his overcoat and gloves, and, donning his hat, made his way into the street. The wind blew the snow into his face, the gas-lights flared and flickered, but Van Lennox was oblivious to all else save his dreary thoughts; for, try as he might, he could not forget that letter. What if it were true? said doubt and mistrust, the two dark fiends which had taken possession of his heart.

"It cannot be true!" he groaned. "She is the very embodiment of truth and honor; she would not be guilty of such a horrible wrong. And she loves me—she loves me with all her heart. God bless my darling—my wife to be." He reached his hotel, and two hours later everything was in readines for an early departure, and in the gray light of a chill, winter dawn Van Lennox started upon his journey—that fatal journey which was destined to mar his whole life.

It was a three days' trip, but Van rather enjoyed it—or he would have done so had it not been for that strange aching in his heart, where the annonymous letter lay upon his breast like a weight of stone.

Stopping at a town on the route, several passengers entered the coach in which Lennox was traveling. Among them was a young man from the town of Scranton, with whom he was somewhat acquainted. The two greeted each other warmly, and Frank Lewis seated himself at Van Lennox's side.

"I have been up the road a day's journey," he said, "and am on my way home to Scranton now. Going to be a grand wedding to-morrow night—have you heard of it? Your old friend, Miss Arden, is going to marry Montgomery, the rich broker. He is immensely wealthy, and everybody says she will be the most envied woman in Scranton. Why, Van, what is the matter?"

"Nothing. I am subject to attacks of pain in my heart. By the why, are you sure of this piece of news, Lewis?"

Frank Lewis nodded confidently.

"Sure as I am alive! There could be no mistake, for Miss Lenore told me herself that she was soon to be married, and as old Montgomery has been devoted in that quarter for a long time, I have no reason to doubt the story that was told me. However, when you reach Scranton——"

"I am not going to Scranton, Frank! I have no business there now, and no desire to attend Miss Arden's wedding. I shall stop at Roxbury and take the first train for home. I ask you—nay, beg of you, to tell no one that you met me. Will you promise me this, Frank?"

"I will. But do nothing rash. I would not have told you of this rumor if Miss Arden herself had not confirmed the story."

"No matter. I have heard something of this before. I have come to the conclusion that women are all alike—frauds and shams—and I have no desire to meet Miss Lenore Arden when she has become Mrs. Montgomery."

He kept his word. At Roxbury he left the train, and a little later was whirling back to his home as fast as steam could carry him. Poor, misguided Van! His rash folly had ruined his own happiness forever.

He returned to his office, a pale brokenhearted man, grave and sad. Days went by. His wedding day that was to have been passed with the rest. Two days later he opened the morning paper and read this announcement;

"Died—Suddenly, of disease of the heart, at her home in Scranton, N. Y., Miss Lenore Arden. Aged 22 years."

And in the marriage notices this:

"Married—At the residence of J. Arden, Esq., on Thursday, the 20th inst., Miss Mabel Arden of Roxbury to Samuel Montgomery, Esq."

The paper fell from Van Lennox's nerveless hands, and he knew no more. For a long time he remained unconscious, and when he awoke to life again he was raging in the delirium of brain fever. It had all been a mad mistake. The annoymous letter had been written by some coward who secretly hated Van Lennox—the marriage to which Lenore Arden had referred in speaking of the approaching wedding to take place at the Arden residence was that of her cousin Mabel as well as her own wedding soon after. It was all a mistake—a game of cross purposes, which had wrought fearful results.

Van Lennox recovered, but he is a heart broken man. Pale and grave, he goes about his daily business. He is getting rich, but he cares nothing for riches; and all the rest of his life is devoted to regret and remorse and undying sorrow for his own rash folly.

What Made the Baby Cross.

"Mamma, I wish you'd call the the baby in; he's so cross we can't play," cried Robert to his mamma one day, as he was playing in the yard with his sister and the baby.

"I don't think he would be cross if you were not cross to him," said mamma, coming out. "He does just as he sees you do. Just try him and see." Put your hat on one side of your head."

Robbie did so, and presently the baby pushed his straw hat over on one side of his head.

"Whistle," said mamma. Robbie did, and baby began to whistle too.

"Stop mocking me," said Robbie angrily, giving baby a push. Baby screamed and pushed Robbie back.

"There, you see," said his mother, "the baby does just as you do. Kiss him now and you will see how quickly he will follow your example."

Robby did not feel exactly like doing this, but he did; and the baby hugged and kissed him back very warmly.

"Now, you see," said his mother, "you can have a cross baby or a good baby of your little brother, just as you choose. But you must teach him yourself."

Great statesman (to married daughter): "My dear, your husband will never amount to anything if you don't spur him on. Why don't you persuade him to go into politics?" Daughter: "But pa, he has tried, and he can't stand it. The whiskey makes him sick."

No one would suspect, in looking at the superlatively unclean Chicago River, that there are several large soap factories located on its banks.

Bob Clavin of Black Gulch.

"Talk about the real estate sharks who are now booming desolate Dakota!" said Colonel Tom Dolan with disgust. "They're nothing compared to the sharks I met out there during the early mining days fifteen years ago. I'll give you an instance:

"A storekeeper in one of the settlements, who had a big stock, wasn't getting rid of it as fast as he thought he ought. In fact, there was danger of the settlement wasting away before his stock could be disposed of. He fixed up a scheme.

"One day a man dressed in a miners garb and mounted on a broncho, rode into the settlement about the time of day when the store was most crowded. Dismounting, he strode into the store. He carried a pair of saddle bags on his arm.

"Give me a new suit of clothes, and all the sugar, coffee, tea, smoking and chewing tobacco, watches and diamonds my horse can carry back,' he said to the storekeeper.

"The articles were bundled up, the man took a handful of large gold nuggets from his saddlebags, threw them down on the counter in payment mounted his loaded horse and rode away.

"'Who is he?' asked the crowd, the moment he had left the store.

"Where does he come from?" they demanded, as soon as they had learned his name.

"Then the storekeeper let out the secret that he was Bob Clavin from Black Gulch, where he and some chums had struck a rich nugget find, and were becoming millionaires.

"'He says the whole country around there is filled with nuggets,' the storekeeper added incidentally.

"All the merchandise in the store was immediately purchased to equip the large party, which at once started for the new gold field.

"And when the party, footsore, heartsore and dead broke, returned from their fruitless wanderings a week later, the storekeeper and Bob Clavin were 100 miles away cracking jokes over the gullibility of some 'suckers.'"

At The Photographers.

"Be you the photograph taker?" inquired a man immediately after shutting himself inside of a St. Paul gallery.

"Yes sir. Can we give you a sitting?"

"A which?"

"Can we take your picture?"

"Wall, that depends. Ef you kin give me satisfactory assurance p'raps you may. Otherwise not."

"What assurance do you want?"

"It's this way; I had my picture took a couple of months ago, and ther next week I seen it in a newspaper with the statement that I was down flat on my back nine years with salt rheum, carsumpsion, yaller janders, liver complaint, hives, ring worm, gallopin' consumption, paralysis, scald head and small pox. They said I took eight bottles of medicine and gained twenty pounds of flesh with every bottle. Now, if you won't ring any such a snap on me I might chance her agin. I've raised a beard now, and if the picture won't look like the medicine sucker, an' you kin give me the assurance, you may p'int the cannon."

Few things delight a woman more than to get a new dress at a bargain, even if she has to pay more than what the material is worth.

Huntersville, W. Va.

March 6, 1890.

The Virginia House has passed a bill making the anniversary of Robert E. Lee's birthday a holiday.

An artificial dam near Prescott, Ariz., gave way on the 23rd inst., inundating small towns, and doing considerable damage both to lives and property.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company had decided to heat all its passenger cars next season to steam. It will cost $250,000 to introduce the steam heat into the 1,200 cars it runs.

A few days ago the Post Office Department received from a postmaster his resignation, with the recommendation of his deputy for the succession, and the explanation that it was necessary that his resignation should be accepted because he was about to leave that part of the country for an indefinite period. This excited the curiosity of the department officials who investigated the matter and found that the phrase "an indefinite period," was exceedingly well chosen. The postmaster wrote his resignation in jail where he was under indictment for killing two men, and as he had no no means of knowing how serious a view of his conduct would be taken by the judge and the jury, and there were also possibilities of a lynching party, the postmaster could not state with any degree of accuracy how long he would be gone.—National Democrat.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

On Monday last the vote was taken in the House of Representatives, to select the place for holding the Worlds' Fair of 1892. On the 8th ballot Chicago won the prize. The competing cities were New York, St. Louis, and Washington. Chicago led on each ballot. One vote, that of Mr. Skinner, of North Carolina, was given for Cumberland Gap, to indicate no doubt, his confidence in that embryo city for 1892. The World's Fair business is not altogether settled from a parliamentary point of view. It will now be in order to commit the Fair bill to the special committee. The committee will frame a bill to meet the requests of Chicago, as it would have prepared a bill of that sort for New York, if New York had been chosen as the place for holding it. Then the bill will come into the House for discussion. No one can tell what will happen to it. If it goes through the House it will then be subject to the revision of the Senate. It is stated that the Senate is strongly in favor of Washington.

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON February, 28th— Secretary Windom is having a hard time just now owing to the pressure that the friends of a number of the bidders for the privilege of taking Seals for twenty years are bringing to bear upon him to decide in their favor, and the air is full of stories connecting various members of the administration and other prominent republicans with one or the other of the bidders. The matter is under the law left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, so that Mr. Windom may, if he sees fit, give the privilege to the bidder that offers the smallest sum. As the privilege has been worth more than a million a year in net profits for the past twenty years it is not strange that there should be a struggle to obtain it, and trouble may be looked for from the disappointed bidders when the ward is made.

Senator Call found it necessary to show up Senator Chandler and his peculiar methods when dealing with Southern matters in the Senate this week, and unfortunately was compelled by truth to use language that was slightly unparliamentary. Mr. Call's language was blamable, but the provocation was certainly great enough to make it excusable. Rules cannot be by gentlemen that will be suitable in dealing with such characters as Senator Chandler.

So uncertain are the republicans about their tariff bill that it is impossible to get them to talk about it. It is not even considered certain now that the tobacco tax is to go, and the committee is said to be hopelessly divided in sentiment as to what, if any, reduction shall be made in the tariff on sugar. The bill, which is now promised by the middle of March, will consist of compromises all through.

One of the latest schemes of the lobbyist is that providing for the purchase by the Government of the real estate on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue between the Capitol and the Treasury. The job is an old one but this is the first time it has been pushed by a regularly organized lobby. Of course the owners of this property can afford to pay big money for help to unload their undesirable and unprofitable property on the Government, but Congress will do well to move slowly in this matter.

Chicago people here are very jubilant, and they have a right to be. They have gained a victory that reflects great credit upon them, but after all the action of the House is not final and it is considered extremely doubtful whether the Senate will pass the bill as it is. Many Senators have expressed themselves as thinking the time entirely too short to get up a creditable exposition. Public sentiment here is in favor of the Senate's passing the bill as it is and trusting to Chicago enterprise to get ready in time.

The Senate committee on Finance has reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to buy $4,500,000 worth of silver bullion a month, and all of the gold bullion offered, paying for both with Treasury certificates. This bill will not pass without considerable opposition. Senator's Beck McPherson and Sherman of the committee are opposed to it.

This week we had the second instalment of the civil service investigation. The star witness was ex Commissioner ("Roddy") Oberly, but contrary to general expectation his evidence was entirely favorable to the commission. It does not now look probable that the investigation will amount to anything either way.

Everybody is asking what Mr Blaine's friend Carnegie, the Pennsylvania millionaire wants of the Pan-Americans. The reason for asking the question is that Mr. Carnegie gave the members of the Pan American Congress the most expensive dinner ever given here, last Tuesday night.

It is expected that the Senate Election committee will decide tomorrow what report it will make in the Montana Senatorial contest. The democrats ought to have their seats, but it is not thought probable they will get them. Republicans seem to think that all four will be thrown out and a new election ordered. Nobody outside has any idea that the republicans will be given the seats.

Instead of abolishing the secret sessions of the Senate certain members of that body are now engaged in trying to make them more secret than ever.

Another democrat, Mr Pendleton of West Virginia has been ousted from his seat to make room for a republican contestant. Several others are awaiting teeir turn.

Secretary Windom has been arguing with the House committee in charge of his silver bill trying to convince them that it was just the measure the country wanted.

The Pan American Congress want a railroad built to connect their countries with the United States.

The district bill has been favorably reported to the House.

Pursuant to a decree of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, West Virginia, rendered on the 21st day of October, 1889, in the Chancery cause of

M. H. Corbett
vs
Wm. E. Johnson and others.

I, as Special commissioner appointed in said decree, shall proceed to sell, in front of the Court House of said County at public auction to the highest bidder

ON THE 7th DAY OF APRIL, 1890,

a one half interest in about 100 acres of land, lying on Greenbrier River, in Pocahontas County, West Virginia, adjoining the lands of James E. Johnson and others, being a half interest in the lands of which Wm Johnson died seized.

TERMS OF SALE.

So much cash in hand as will pay costs of suit and sale, and for the residue, the purchaser will be required to execute two bonds with good security falling due respectively in Six and Twelve months from day of sale and bearing interest from date. A lien will be retained as ultimate security.

H. S. RUCKER, Spec'l Com'r.

I, J. Beard, Cl'k of Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, W. Va., do certify that bond as required has been given by the above commissioner.

JOHN J. BEARD, Cl'k.

Mar. 6-4t Printer's fee $9.97.

GOOD FLOUR.

2½ cts pr. pound, meal 75 cts per bushel at H. M. McClintic's mill, also his flour at A. Barlow's Huntersville, and Barlow & Moore's, Edray. mar. 3m.

Valuable Lands for Rent.

I shall offer for rent for the term of one year, at the front door of the Court House of Pocahontas County,

ON THE 7th DAY OF APRIL, 1890,

the lands belonging to Allie McGlaughlin, recently assigned her out of her father's estate, situate on Elk, about 5 miles from Edray. This is a valuable tract of grazing and meadow land. The renter, however shall be required to keep no sheep on said land while in his possession.

For further particulars apply to the undersigned, or to M. D. McGlaughlin at Huntersville

Terms made known on day of renting.

SUSAN McGLAUGHLIN,
Guardian of ALLIE McGLAUGHLIN.

—Rev. C. C. Arbogast, of Green Bank called to see us Tuesday.

—Quite a number of persons attended Court Tuesday.

—T. A. Bruffey, Esq., of Lobelia was in to see us Monday.

—Asbury Dysard, Esq., of Driftwood was in to see us last week.

—John T Dixon, Esq., of Ronceverte was in town last week.

—First day of March cold and snow, second day awful cold, third day mild.

—The cold snap the first of the week made a little ice for the ice houses.

—Wm. Gladwell, Esq., and wife, of Green Bank, are visiting at Mr. A. Barlow's this week.

—County Court met Tuesday, with the usual Commissioners on the bench.

—S. L. Brown, Esq., and wife have been on the sick list for several days past, but are much better now.

—Double shovel plows, genuine Malta, and the Brown. Also full line of blades and steel shapes. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—Presto! Change! Gray and faded beards made to assume their original color by applying Buckingham's Dye for the Whiskers. It never fails to satisfy.

—Oliver Chill plows and repairs direct from factory, no imitation goods. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—We are authorized to announce that Mrs. Z. T. Webb will offer for sale at public auction next Saturday all of her household and kitchen furniture, and a set of blacksmith tools.

—Silver steel plows, will stay in gravel without any trouble and run lighter and take more ground than any plow on the market. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—Miss Lucy Peck and Mr. T. A. Bruffey, of Lobelia, were married to-day (Wednesday) at the house of the brides father, D. A. Peck, Esq. THE TIMES extends congratulations.

—The celebrated Simonds saws, for both Pine and hard woods. All [illegible] a specialty. Cast back and cast hook steel and iron. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—Avoid Appearances.—A worthy gentleman, having an unusual red nose, was long suspected of being a tippler on the sly, by those not well acquainted with his strictly temperate habits. His unfortunate disfigurement was readily cured by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

—We return thanks for an invitation to attend the marriage of Miss Lucie Barlow to C. R. Moore, Esq., on the 6th inst., at 9 o'clock a. m., at the Methodist church. They are a most worthy couple, stand very high in society circles and [illegible] will be a brilliant affair.

—Miss [illegible] Treadway, of Green Bank and Mr. [illegible] Harnett Home, of Oke Nake, W. Va., were married Tuesday evening at about 7 o'clock, by the Rev. Geo. P. —A very small amount of maple sugar has been made so far this season.

—Our correspondent, Pocahontas, as well as ourself, endorsed the name of Attorney C. F. Moore of this place a week or two ago as the most suitable man we could send to the State Senate, and as far as we learn, from all parts of the County, and Senatorial District, has met with the most hearty approval, and if a convention is held and Mr. Moore will accept the nomination he will be sent to the State Senate with a majority that any Democratic Senatorial District would be proud of.

—The mail from Mt. Grove, failed to come in again last Wednesday. The carrier gave as his excuse "high water," but that wasn't much of an excuse as people crossed all day, and both the mails from this place left that morning and returned again in the evening crossing the same creek the Mt. Grove mail would have to cross. If this happens anymore without a good excuse, we'll have to inform Uncle Sam and have him to look around and see if he can't find some one to carry the Mt. Grove mail that ain't afraid to cross the creeks when any body else can cross.

—The new piece of road near Lockridge's ford, made by Col., D. A. Fisher, for which he received about four hundred dollars of the County's funds has several rods of it slipped into the old road, making it almost impassable for a wagon, and at a place where it will take at least from one to a hundred and fifty dollars to fix. Now, whether this is the Col's fault, the fault of the road commissioners, or any one's fault we are unable to say; but one thing, we do know, is that the road is gone, and the Counties money is gone, and who's the better off except the contractor.

—From Mill Gap Items in Highland, Recorder we clip the following complimentary notice of our Presbyterian pastor:

Rev. Wm. T. Price, of Pocahontas Co., W. Va., preached at Beulah Church on Saturday the 15th inst. There was a good congregation out to hear the familiar voice of some 20 years ago. His text was, "So then faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the word of God."—Romans, X. 17. His text on Sunday morning was, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believed in God, believe also in me."—John, XIV, 1. Notwithstanding the heavy roads there was a large congregation out to hear this sainted man. On Sunday eve he preached at Old Green Hill; text, I believe, on the Son of God. We hope he will come back soon, and come often."

Hillsboro Locals.

Mr. James Gibson, of Elk was in town last week.

Mrs. Kate McNeil and family, of Williamsburg, are visiting relatives and friends at this place.

Miss Edmonia Gumm, has returned home from Liberty, Va., where she was visiting relatives and friends.

Mr. Preston Dunlap, of Marble Valley is visiting his brother.

Messrs. N. J. Brown, G. F. Cranwell and Miss Lydia McNeel, left for Washington City, this morning.

Mr. Mitchell Beard, of Beaver Creek, was in town to-day.

A couple of Mormon preachers passed through our town last week, but they kept the middle of the road.

The public temperance meeting at this place was a success. Two very able addresses were made by Rev. W. R. Miller and Prof. D. S. [illegible].

RUTH & TRUE.

The knitting factory at [illegible] went into operation last Monday a week ago. It will employ eighty hands.

Green Bank Items.

Miss Kitty Lakin, of Dunmore, spent last week at the Parsonage.

Miss Lou Hevener, has been spending several days with Miss Flora Mooman.

Mr. Henry Sharp, of Douthard's Creek, spent Friday night in town and returned Saturday accompanied by his daughter, Miss Dosia, whose school closed Wednesday.

Dr. T. H. Slaven and Mr. R. B. Slaven, spent Saturday night in town as the guests of Mr. J. H. Patterson.

Miss Cora Jones, was up Thursday night and furnished choice music for the Missionary, anniversary which, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, was a very enjoyable occasion.

Married, at the residence of Mr. Emory Conrad on Thursday the 27th, by Rev. W. H. Ballengee, Mr. French Sutton and Miss Birdie Pugh.

Died, at her home, about 5 miles above here, on Friday the 28 inst, Jinnie Slaton aged about 85 years.

Died, in the same neighborhood, on Saturday night March, 1st Mr. Washington Nottingham aged about 72 years. The deceased had been a great sufferer for many years with Asthma but the immediate cause of his death was La Grippe.

DAULINA.

Driftwood Siftings.

Mud, rain and snow is our daily visitors.

Lumbering seems to be the most attended to business of this part and has caused some broken, bruised and skinned shanks.

A night visitor has been attending the smoke houses and corncribs of the wakeless people of Elk Lick Run.

Mrs. Anna Courtney, who has been suffering, with LaGrippe is improving at this writing.

Geiger & Co., have sent a model of the Churn Dasher to Washington, D. C., of which they will receive a patent in the near future, and the people of Pocahontas need be surprised, when they learn that it is one of the leading and most useful inventions of the day.

Mr. Andrew Geiger launched his little "red canoe" for Ronceverte on the 26th where he will take the train for Lexington, Ky., where he is going to attend school. Success go with him as he is as good a Fleming man as ever scaled a West Virginia hill.

We notice that Prof. Jasper Varner is the principal subject of the Brushy Run Items. Why is it that such a small object will cause such great attention?

Jessie Rexroad, general merchandiser, chief cook and bottle washer of Driftwood, will soon have a vacant store house, on account of the death of the horse that carried his stock from Baltimore.

What has become of the preachers? Stony Bottom has not seen one since Goff died.

Mr. Geo. Qay is building a new house on Dixie Bottom which will add much to the looks of Dixie.

Mr. Joseph J. McGlaughlin, is wanting to sell his farm but we think he is jesting, if not, why would he be looking so pleasant at the girls for?

Success to THE TIMES.

An Even Thing.

I had had a big chunk of lead from a confederate cavalry carbine driven into my shoulder at Brandy Station, and was in hospital at Washington for treatment, when an Ohio infantryman was placed on the cot next on the left. He had been shot in the leg about two months before, and after every effort had been made to save the limb he had been brought here to have it amputated. A surgeon came one day to notify him that the operation would be performed the next day, and Bill, as we called him, listened and then replied:

"Say, Doc, I'm waiting for a letter from the old woman. I wrote to her that the leg would probably have to come off, and I want to hear what she has to say."

"But that can't make any difference."

"Well, perhaps not, but I kind o' want her opinion. She's always been down on one-legged men, and I want to see whether she's going back on me or not."

"But she won't, of course."

"You don't know about that. Women is curus. When she begins to think of me clattering up and down with a wooden pin and realizing that I've got to go stumping around for life, she may feel a disgust. Give me two or three days more in which to get a letter."

The surgeon consented and in two days the letter came. Bill was very nervous and excited and he asked me to read the epistle and give him the news. It wasn't from his wife, but from her sister, and she wrote:

"On the day that you wrote Mary that your leg would have to come off we started to drive over to Uncle Ben's. The horse ran away, smashed everything up, and Mary's left leg was so badly broken that it was amputated yesterday. She has the best of care and is doing well. She sends love and advises you to have your leg off at once."

"Whoop!" yelled Bill, in a voice which aroused the whole ward. "It's her left and my right. Two wooden pins to go clattering up and down! Two legs to hang up on the wall when we turn in at night! One of you nurses go and tell old Sawbones to come in here and open his butcher shop as soon as he pleases, and some of you boys write to Mary that we'll be the happiest couple in the whole Buckeye State!"

We read a great deal in the papers about the vanity of woman. Probably the people who laugh at it never happen to see a man adjusting his new silk hat before the glass in the hallway, preliminary to starting down-town.

If a lovely woman smacks me on one cheek I will turn her the other also, bravely exclaims a humorist.

When a woman wants the earth, it is with the view of giving it to some man.

An Unappreciated Professor.

"A man might as well be a hangman as a dentist, as far as expecting any gratitude for his services," remarked an aggrieved member of that unappreciated profession. "I have worked for hours over a back filling in a woman's mouth where I had to nearly dislocate my neck and tie my backbone into a bow-knot, and at the end, if I venture to straighten up with a sigh of relief, I have been rewarded with a stony glare of indignant condemnation.

"A woman will stand more pain than a man for a woman has an inborn instinct of showing herself to the best advantage," he continued. "A rubber dam or a mouth stretched to its utmost capacity are not conductive to personal beauty, and therefore a woman will not add the further disfigurement of lack of courage.

"I had rather a funny experience the other day with an old darkey who wanted a tooth pulled. His face was elaborately tied up in red flannel and his expression was the embodiment of woe. The tooth was a hard one to handle, and just as I gave it the final yank he gave a prolonged howl and fairly shot himself through the open window, out on the shed roof beneath. He rolled over this roof still howling and finally dropped from it to the ground, all doubled up like a rubber ball. All this, instead of hurting him, served to help his case, for he picked himself up and walked off apparently sound in the wind and limb and quite regardless of the fact that he had not paid me.

"I had a man once give me more than I wanted for pulling his tooth. He was a big strapping fellow and I thought the tooth would never come. The forceps slipped off three times, but the fourth time I clinched it. The man never moved or made a sound until the tooth came out, when he doubled up his fist and landed a blow on my chest that slapped me up against the wall as flat as a lump of putty. Then he took his hat and stalked out, without waiting to see whether I got my breath or not."

I was settling down to work when a pretty woman entered my office. No one would suspect that she was a book agent. She placed a volume in front of me and began to talk. I told her I would not buy the book if I really wanted it. "Never mind," said she, gaily. "It won't cost you anything to look at it."

As she desired, I did look at it. I read the introduction and then chapter I. It was about 10 o'clock when I opened the book. At 11 o'clock the pretty book agent had become uneasy. I never raised my eyes. Another hour and she was pacing up and down the floor. At 1 o'clock, when she had nearly worn herself out, I laid the book down, and, putting on my hat and coat, said to the thoroughly exasperated woman: "That's a clever book; I regret that I cannot read more of it, but I must go away to dinner."

She was mad, but she didn't say a word. Grabbing the book, she shoved it into her satchel and made for the street.

No one is allowed to destroy pavements, yet it is not unusual to see a man go tearing up the street.

There is hope in the future for every man. Even for the youth with a pair of tight shoes on, there is a blissful prospect of bedtime.

"Come, take a walk, Julietta."

"No, can't. You see my wife's not very well, and I'm going to the theatre."

A YEAR IN HEAVEN.

A year in in heaven for her. What is she learning
Of holy things, of things divine and true?
What glorious visions there are still unfolding
Which here she never knew!

Did angel friends await her coming?
Did angel faces greet her with a smile?
Were all the dear ones eager to receive her
Whom she had lost awhile?

And has she seen the loving, blessed Jesus,
Sat at his feet or felt his fond embrace?
Or even can it be that she is able
To see the Father's face?

A year on earth for us without her presence—
A year of loneliness and grief and pain;
But still we smile amid our tears in thinking
Our loss is but her gain.

We miss her in our joys and in our sorrows;
She was our life, our center and our sun.
And yet we would not call her back, but whisper,
"O God, thy will be done!"

For heaven and earth are very close together.
Though she is there, she is not far away.
She could not leave the dear ones, loved so fondly,
Even in heaven to stay!

But still her spirit, like a guardian angel,
Is bending o'er us with her own fond care,
And sometimes she brings heaven so very near us,
We almost think we're there!

A year in heaven for her, of rest and blessing;
For us a year on earth, with her above;
But heaven and earth are both together blending,
And over all is Love.

ROSINE'S ROMANCE.

BY KATE M. CLEARY.

When Miss Magnolia carefully withdrew the dress from the great cedar trunk, unpinned the old damask tablecloth which enveloped it, and spread out its shining fold for the admiration of her niece, Rosine, that young lady clasped her pretty hands and quoted Keats.

"'A thing of beauty is a joy forever!'" she said.

Miss Magnolia nodded and smiled. She was altogether unlike the large, fair, splendid flower, after which she had been christened—almost grotesquely unlike, in fact. She was small and round, and brown, as a maiden lady of a decidedly certain age could be. Indeed she reminded one of nothing so much as a little russet apple. But her heart, which had been full of sentiment once, was a warm and sensitive organ still. And she took a deal of interest in Rosine's romance.

"Yes, my dear, it is a thing of beauty! And to think I never wore it but twice. Dear, dear!" And she went on stroking the primrose satin, tenderly as a mother touches the hair of a child.

"You had a lover then, auntie?" asked Rosine.

"Yes, pet, this is one of the dresses I got for my marriage. But he went away,—on business, he said. And he never came back."

Hastily she wiped her eyes lest a tear should stain the shimmering stuff she held. "It is just the gown for your fancy dress ball," hurried on Miss Magnolia. "A trifle short, of course, but there is quite a piece turned in at the top that you could let down. You shall go as a lady of long ago."

"Not so very long ago," protested Rosine, with a laugh. "But really, auntie, I don't like to take it. It is too lovely!"

"Not at a moment of war! No member you are going to conquer the dragon?"

"That is so. And the maiden [illegible] wisely, 'There is she armed who wears a pretty dress!'"

The foe against whom Miss Rosine Wilde purposed arraying herself was the obdurate uncle of her handsome lover. Most promptly and perversly had he opposed the marriage of his nephew. The young fellow would have ignored the refusal of his relative, were it not the old gentleman had always been very kind and good to him; had indeed taken the place of his dead father to him. So he decided that Rosine should meet his uncle and put his prejudice to rout.

"He is coming to visit an old friend of his," Cyril had said—"Judge Chartreau. You know the Chartreau family. Of course you have heard they are going to give a fancy dress ball next month in honor of the coming out of their daughter, Lissette. You will receive a card. You will attend. You will meet Uncle Albert. And you will take his heart by storm."

Hopefully had he planned his scheme; enthusiastically had he explained it. But Rosine protested. It was to be a grand ball, and she had nothing to wear. Besides, she did not like the idea of plotting to make a person like her.

"Bless you," cried Cyril, "he doesn't dislike you. I don't believe he even knows your name. His resentment is general, not particular. As soon as I told him I was in love with a Southern girl, he—he (I have to drop it into slang, Rosine)—he sat square down on me. It seems a Southern girl jilted him when he was young, and he is bound to save me from a like awful fate. But when once he sees you, he is bound to capitulate. He is a regular old brick—Uncle Albert!"

"But I have nothing to wear. And, what is more, I can't buy a dress for the Chartreau ball. We—Aunt Magnolia and I—are poor as the proverbial church mice."

But just then Miss Magnolia came to Rosine's relief like a regular little fairy godmother.

"The very thing!" she cried—"my primrose satin!"

Rosine regarded her dubiously, delightedly.

Jealously she knew had her aunt always guarded her trunkful of treasures, her jewels, her laces, her rich, stiff, glistening old brocades.

"Do you mean it, auntie?"

Miss Magnolia's bright old eyes winked very rapidly indeed.

"I do, my dear! I was young myself once."

And that was how Rosine Wilde came to be the belle of Madame Chartreau's fancy dress ball. The proposed festivity had been the talk of New Orleans for several weeks. The night long anticipated was cool, crisp, sweet and pearly. Brilliantly lighted was the broad balconied old residence on St. Charles street. Many a carriage rolled up, rolled off. When Rosine descended from the barouche of her chaperon she felt a little elated, and conscious that she was looking uncommonly well—as indeed she was. Quite a picture was the pretty young figure, in the clinging gown of pale yellowish satin, picturesquely puffed and quaintly fashioned. The [illegible] revealed the firm, full throat, [illegible] of the arms, which, [illegible], were also [illegible]. And the small, [illegible] face was lit up by [illegible] black eyes. A flash of admiration succeeded the serene nonchalance of Cyril Rodney's countenance, as he caught sight of her. He made his way to her side.

"Queen Rosine!" he murmured. "I wonder if you know that you're by far the prettiest girl here tonight! Poor Uncle Albert!—how complete will be his surrender! Now, prepare to face the music!"

And off he went! He soon returned. By his side was a sturdy old gentleman.

Rosine's heart beat more rapidly. Silvery hair had the dragon. A dark moustache had the dragon. A florid complexion had the dragon. And a manner that was grave, dignified, courteous.

"Uncle Albert," explained Cyril, with boyish eagerness, "this is Miss Rosine Wilde."

Wilde! The old gentleman started perceptibly. He looked at the blushing girl—at the yellowish gown. He bowed.

"And," avowed young Rodney, sending his sweetheart a swift smile of encouragement, "and—the young lady of whom I spoke to you."

"Oh!" exclaimed Albert Ellsworth. Then interrogatively: "Wilde? Was your father's name Clayton Wilde?"

Rosine assented.

"And your mother's maiden name was Magnolia Kingsley?"

"Oh, dear, no! Aunt Magnolia was never married. My mother's name was Madeline Kingsley."

"Eh—Eh?" cried the dragon.

The florid color had faded from his cheeks. He was tugging nervously at his moustache. He looked agitated, perplexed.

"My mother died ten years ago," said Rosine, "and since then I have lived with Aunt Magnolia."

Mr. Elsworth regarded her grimly.

"Is that," he asked abruptly, "your aunt's gown you have on?"

The soft rose fire in the girl's cheek deepened.

"How in the world did you know?" she counter-questioned.

A queer, wavering smile was his only reply.

A constrained silence ensued. Cyril gave his uncle an astonished glance.

"So Magnolia is an old maid?" said Mr. Ellsworth, abruptly.

"If she is," cried Rosine, stung to defence by a remark she chanced to consider rude, "it is because she was true to a lover who proved unworthy of her!"

"Eh!" ejaculated Mr. Ellsworth, more sharply than before. And suddenly he turned and walked away.

The following day he insisted on accompanying his nephew to the gaunt, ramshackle, once aristocratic old home in the French quarter, where dwelt Rosine. As they were passing the vaulted entrance to the little flagged court yard, Albert Ellsworth caught sight of a familiar figure moving among the potted palms and boxes of blooms.

"Go on, lad!" he said to Cyril. He had paused, and was looking through the brief avenue of gloom to the brightness beyond.

Cyril was about to question this new vagary, when the thought of a peculiar possibility made him catch his breath and do as bidden. He knocked at the barred black door, and was admitted to Rosine's radiant presence. And meanwhile his uncle went into the courtyard. The little old lady standing by the banana tree looked up at the sound of the step on the stones.

"Magnolia!" he cried.

Miss Magnolia gazed at him in a dazed, half frightened kind of way. Did ghosts ever appear in the day time? Stouter than he whom she had known, and with hair grown gray. But the same. Around her, in a fantastic dance, the broken fountain, the long leaved banana tree, and the giant oleanders went whirling. She didn't faint, but she came nearer to it than she ever had come in her life.

"Did you think I had deserted you Magnolia? When I left you to go North on business, I believed in you as I've never believed in any one since. And while away I heard and read, that you had married that young Wilde I used to be so jealous of. So I went to Europe. And I stayed there."

"But Clayton Wilde married Madeline. I always told you he came to see her."

"Yes, I know that—now. I was a fool to have been so easily convinced of your falsity. You haven't changed a bit. I knew you the moment I saw you."

Miss Magnolia smiled delightedly. She did not know he had expected to see her.

"I never forgot the dress you wore the last time I saw you," declared Mr. Elsworth, waxing fervent. "I recognized it on your niece last night."

"Last night! Are you—surely you are not the dragon?"

"What?"

"The—the dragon!" faltered Miss Magnolia.

Mr. Ellsworth still looked blank.

"That," murmured the little lady, feeling she was in for it, and might as well make a clean breast, "was what Rosine and I called Cyril's uncle. And Rosine was going to conquer him."

"Well, she did. The boy shall marry Madeline's pretty daughter. And you, Magnolia,—you'll marry me!"

"Oh, dear, no! I'm too old."

"Not a day."

"And ugly—now."

"Loveliest woman in the world to to me," insisted the dragon, loyally.

"Bless you, my children!" cried a voice from above.

The pair in the court yard glanced up. On one of the inner balconies, stood Rosine and Cyril.

"Vanish, you scamps!" roared the dragon.

"I shan't allow you to marry a Southern girl, sir!" shouted back Cyril, as he and Rosine beat a brisk retreat.

Laughing and breathless they faced each other in the old drawing-room.

"Everything's lovely, sweetheart!" cried Cyril, in an ecstasy.

Rosine looked deliciously doleful.

"That's just the trouble!" with a pout so provokingly pretty that her lover kissed her there and then. "If he had remained hard-hearted, like the uncles in novels, we could have run away, and lived in a cottage 'bowered in roses, and covered with thatch?' There isn't a bit of romance when everything turns out so beautifully—all at once."

"You little hypocrite!" he said.

Sweet Girl (anxiously)—Did Fre—I mean Mr. Nicefellow, call to see you to-day, papa?

Papa—Yes, and to oblige him I consented, I suppose time hangs heavy on his hands.

(Mystified) "Why—why, what did he say?"

"He requested the pleasure of a series of games of chess with me. The first one we will play this evening, and after that every third evening during the winter. I hope my dear, you will keep out of the library, as chess is a very absorbing occupation."

WASHINGTON LETTER

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7.—Secretary Reagon uttered a sound truth, and one that is worthy of the most careful consideration when in opposing a bill to increase the pension of a general's widow to $100 a month, he said: Instead of this Government being one of the people and by the people, it is rapidly becoming a Government of the classes for the classes and by the classes." This is a true bill, there is entirely too much class legislation in this country, and it is on the increase all the time, and it remains for the people to stop it. Now they have the power, but if the interference is delayed too long the classes will be stronger than the people.

Again there are whispers to the effect that the republicans will report no tariff bill this session because at the end of the session the Treasury surplus it is expected will have been turned into a deficiency. The rumor may possibly be true about no bill being reported, but if so it is solely because the republican protectionists have not been able to throttle the demand for tariff reform among their republican colleagues. The cry for free raw material is becoming a loud one, particularly from the Eastern manufacturers, within a week Senator Hale, who has been pronounced a protectionist as Mr. Blaine; presented a long petition from New England manufacturers asking that raw materials used by them be admitted free of duty.

The first year of the Harrison administration has closed, and one naturally looks around to see what has been accomplished, and is compelled to answer: nothing worthy of even a single line in the history of the country. The year has been devoted mostly to removing democrats from office and settling disputes among republicans as to which of them should be fed at the public crib.

The Senators are some of them talking of boycotting the newspaper men because they refuse to tell how they find out what is done in the alleged secret sessions. The Senate will do well to go very slow in this matter because there is a possibility that the newspapers of the country might retaliate by boycotting the Senate, and if they did the temperature would be pretty low in the north end of the Capitol building. The newspapers can exist without the Senate, but it is by no means certain that the Senate can exist without the newspapers.

Mr. Harrison has issued another buncombe proclamation warning all persons against illegally taking fur bearing animals in Behrings sea. He issued a similar one soon after he entered office and the Canadian vessels seized under it and turned loose with prize crews of one man each made the United States the laughing stock of the world. The farce is presumably to be repeated this year.

It has been suggested by a prominent democrat that instead of consuming four days time in unseating a democrat, as was done by the House this week in the case of Mr. Late, of Arkansas, the majority should get Speaker Reed to make a ruling compelling the House to vote as soon as the report of the committee on Elections is received. The result would be the same and it would save lots of time.

The members of the Three Americas Congress are to make a tour of the principal cities of the South as soon as the Congress adjourns, which it is thought will be about April 1.

The public, after coming to the conclusion that the charges had been sustained, seem to have lost interest in the proceedings of the investigation of the Civil Service Commission. Shidy was the witness that settled things.

D. H. Bates, formerly Superintendent of the B. & O. Telegraph Company and a representative of the Knights of Labor, made arguments this week before the House committee on Post-offices in favor of Wanamaker's postal-telegraph scheme.

Some surprise was caused among democrats when ex-Governor Warmouth was confirmed by the Senate Collector of the port of New Orleans by democratic votes. If the democrats had voted solidly against him his nomination would have been rejected.

Ex-congressman, Taulbee who was shot at the Capitol by Correspondent Kincaid, is in a critical condition and his death is hourly expected.

Senator Babour, of Virginia, spoke for, and Senator Spooner against the Blair bill this week.

A naval court of inquiry will investigate the alledged cruelty of Capt. McCalla, of the U.S.S. Enterprise, to his men.

The bill transferring the weather bureau to the War department has been favorably reported to the Senate.

Secretary Windom's silver bill is having a hard time in the hands of the House committee on coinage.

New Railroad Company.

The West Virginia Central Railway Company has been incorporated by the Secretary of State. The road which this company proposes to build will start from the Ohio river, at or near the town of Ceredo W. Va. running thence through the counties of Cabell and Putnam to Charleston station on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway, crossing the Kanawha at or near Charleston, and proceeding up north bank of the Kanawha river to Gauley river, up Gauley to nearly its source through the conties of Kanawha, Fayette, Nicholas, Webster and Pocahontas to a point at or near Harrisonburg Rockingham county, Va., thence through the counties of Madison, Culpepper, Fauquier and Stafford to Aquia Creek or Belle Plain, on the Potomac river. The principal office of the company is to be kept at Philadelphia with a branch office at Charleston, W. Va., and at Aquia Creek or Belle Plain, as the company may see fit. The capital stock is to be $5,000,000. The incorporators are Alexander Boudron, Franklin Noble, Frederick T. Clark, N. Bierbower, Silas A Kromer and J. W. Ancott, all of Philadelphia.

OBITUARY.

Died, at his home near Green Bank, on March 2nd, 1890, Washington Nottingham, in the 72nd year of his age. In his death Pocahontas county looses another of her best citizens. Mr. Nottingham was noted for his sterling integrity and many good qualities. He was a brother of Adam Nottingham, dec'd, a former representative of Pocahontas county and a twin brother of Harvy Nottingham, of Dunmore. His death reminds us of the fact that a class of citizens so much needed for building up our county in early days, are rapidly passing away. He will be greatly missed by his former neighbors and friends. While he was not a member of any church until a short time before his death, his conscentuous discharge of all christian duties furnished every evidence of his acceptance with Christ for many years prior to his death as many can testify to the truth of this statement, who heard his experience on Brush Run the last Sabbath of the protracted meeting a few moths ago, when he stated, that he had been seeking for sometime past the pearl of great price, "but now I am happy, out of darkness and into light." None of those present will, doubtless, ever forget this aged man's experience. Many hearts were touched when he arose from his seat to give in his experience, many tear were seen trickling down from the eyes of those present many were heard to say "Amen" while others said "Glory to God," and others came forward and gave him the right hand of fellowship and bade him God speed. After this, as I understand, the way grew brighter—until the lamp of life was extinguished in the damp night of death.

The writer of this, realizes, that he has lost one among his best friends in the vicinity. The bereaved have the sympathy of the entire community in their sad bereavement. But as the poet says, and as I have realized by sad experience;

"Tis hard to part with one so dear,
With one we loved so fondly here—
But there, why should we weep and mourn?
For he has gone to Heaven his home.

We hope to meet that one again,
When life with all its cares are o'er,
We hope to see his smiling face,
When we get home to yon bright shore."

Orange Blossoms.

On Thursday, March 6th, at 9 o'clock, a. m., Mr. C. Rice Moore, of Dunmore, and Miss Lucie Barlow, of our town, were united in marriage. The ceremony was performed at the Southern Methodist church, of which the contracting parties are both members, and was conducted by Rev. W. H Ballengee, of Green Bank.

The attendant were Mr. Harry Moore with Miss Maggie Patterson and Mr. William Pritchard with Miss Flora Mooman. The bride and her maids were all becomingly attired, while the gentlemen appeared in conventional style. Immediately after the ceremony the parties accompanied by a few friends proceeded to Dunmore, where they were warmly received and royally entertained at the home of the groom's mother, Mrs. A. H. Moore.

There they found awaiting them, tables groaning under the weight of a choice and tempting dinner, and some seventy-five or more invited guests to assist in making merry the occasion. Everything attested in a substancial and convincing manner the high esteem in which the mother held her son and the kindly feeling she had for her neighbors. Mrs. Moore is one of those persons who finds happiness in serving others, and heartily believes in that unselfish type of hospitality that unfortunately is now less common than it was in olden times.

Mr. Moore and his bride, after stopping a couple of days at Dunmore, started on a trip to Washington and other points east, where they will spend some time.

John L. Sullivan, insulted a young man in a saloon in New York the other day, and was knocked down.

A train of freight cars over a mile long was hauled into Grafton, by one engine a few days ago.

COMMISSIONER'S SALE

Of Valuable Lands.

Pursuant to, and by virtue of a decree of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, W. Va., rendered at its June term, 1889, in the cause of

J. H. Arbogast, Adm'r,
vs.
J. H. Arbogast's Heirs &c.,

I will sell at public auction to the highest bidder in front of the Court house door in Pocahontas County, W. Va., on MONDAY, 7TH DAY OF APRIL, 1890, all the lands yet belonging to the Estate of Jacob H. Arbogast, dec'd, composed of a tract of 45 acres; part of a tract of 133 acres and part of a tract of 50 acres, all adjoining each other, and containing in the aggregate about 177 acres, lying in the forks of Greenbrier River on the S. & P. Turnpike. About 63 acres of these lands are in cultivation, with a good dwelling and other buildings and orchard &c., The balance affords a good outlet for young stock, especially sheep, and has some good Hemlock, Spruce and Oak timber upon it.

TERMS OF SALE:

10 per cent. of the purchase money cash in hand, the balance in equal payments falling due in 9, 18 and 27 months from day of sale, with interest from that day. The purchaser to execute bonds with good security for the deferred payments, a lein will be retained until a future order of the Court.

WHAT IS A GENTLEMAN?

What is a gentleman? Is it a thing
Decked with a scarf-pin, a chain and a ring—
Dressed in a suit of immaculate style,
Sporting an eye-glass, a lisp, and a smile;
Talking of races, of concerts, and balls,
Evening assemblies and afternoon calls,
Sunning himself at "at homes" and bazaars,
Whistling mazurkas, and smoking cigars?

What is a gentleman? Say, is it one
Boasting of conquests and deeds he has done?
One who unblushingly glories to speak
Things which should call up a flush to his cheek?
One who, while railing at actions unjust,
Robs some young heart of its pureness and trust
Scorns to steal money, or jewels or wealth,
Thinks it no wrong to take honor by stealth?

What is a gentleman? Is it not one
Knowing instinctively what he should shun,
Speaking no word that could injure or pain,
Spreading no scandal, and deep'ning no stain?
One who knows how to put each at his ease,
Striving successfully, always to please—
One who can tell by a glance at your cheek
When to be silent and when he should speak?

What is a gentleman? Is it not one
Honestly eating the bread he has won,
Walking in uprightness, fearing his God,
Leaving no stain on the path he has trod;
Caring not whether his coat may be old,
Prizing sincerity far above gold,
Recking not whether his hand may be hard
Stretching it boldly to grasp its reward?

What is a gentleman? Say, is it birth
Makes a man noble or adds to his worth?
Is there a family tree to be had
Shady enough to conceal what is bad?
Seek out the man who has God for his guide,
Nothing to tremble at, nothing to hide,
Be he noble, or be he in trade,
He is the gentleman Nature has made.

ACROSS THE HALL.

It was a double house, with a hall and stirway exactly in the centre, and rooms upon either side. Mrs. Samson, when she rented it, enthusiastically declared it must have been built for a boarding house, so admirably did it suit that purpose, although the millionaire who did build it would have groaned in horror at such a suggestion.

[illegible] a boarding house it was, and [illegible] conducted, comfortable, one [illegible] I, Harry Bell, engaged a room [illegible] third floor, and brought my [illegible]gings there. Now I was fully [illegible] that the creme de la creme of [illegible] Samson's boarders did not re[illegible] above the second floor, and on [illegible] that she called "clerks, you [illegible], and people who cannot pay a [illegible] board," dwelt upon the third [illegible] fourth floors. So I let her [illegible] what she pleased about my [illegible]e, acceded to her demand for [illegible]eek always in advance," and [illegible] I was a medical student, al[illegible]h I had graduated three years before.

"Did you get in old fellow?" Steve Harlan asked me, the next time we met.

"I did."

"Next room?"

"Engaged! Mine is across the hall."

"Well? Who is she?"

"Companion to an ancient party on the next floor below. Maid has a room next the mistress. Companion mounts another flight of stairs. And we sit opposite each other at the table. The ancient party glares at me as if I owed her something. Perhaps she thinks I want to feel her pulse. She is a corpulent individual, red in the face, and eats like a rhinoceros. The companion looks prettier than ever beside her."

"Got any names?"

"Yes. Ancient party is Mrs Carter. Companion is Elsie Lennox."

Then Steve whistled with so much significance that I cried, with convictions.

"You know her?"

"I should rather think I did! Her father failed, for goodness knows how much, two years ago, and like Lewis Carrol's baker, he 'softly and suddenly vanished away' from his creditors, leaving Elsie with her aunt. Mrs Carter is a distant relative—cousin, or something. Why, three years ago Elsie Lennox was the belle of the season."

I did not know whether I was glad or sorry to hear all this. I had seen Elsie Lennox in the street, had seen her enter Mrs Samson's several times, and her exquisite face and graceful figure had won so much warm admiration that I longed to know her, to speak to her, hoping, perhaps, to win from her some answering interest and liking.

And so I applied for board at Mrs. Samson's. and having seen Elsie's face at a third story window, obtained possession of the corresponding window on the other side of the hall.

It was not difficult to strike up an acquaintance, but very difficult, I found it, to gain more that a scant courtesy from Miss Lennox. The ancient party, Mrs., Carter, evidently allowed no "followers," for she most decidedly snubbed me whenever I tried to make myself agreeable. And how I did try! I offered her the use of all my numerous magazines, only to be informed that she subscribed herself for everything worth reading. I brought flowers to her, and saw them fade in the hall, because she thought the scent unhealthy in a room. I offered to attend to any business she might have down town, and was informed that her agent and her maid attended to her affairs. And at about this stage of the proceedings I became uncomfortably aware that Miss Lennox was laughing at me.

I dropped Mrs. Carter then, and directed my attention to Miss Lennox; but it was certainly the most up-hill courting ever attempted.

Miss Lennox was cold as ice, and Mrs. Carter gave her but little leisure time, so that meeting in the public parlor was simply a vexation. I tried other tactics. I waited in my own room until my neighbor across the hall went to dinner, and then stepping over, left, just inside her door, such offerings as flowers, fruit or books. I wrote tender verses and slipped them under her door; and once—only once—I took my violin when she was singing in her room to her own piano accompaniment, and followed the air in my tenderest strains. The emphatic bang with which the piano was closed effectually prevented any repetition of that effort.

I had begun to despair, when fortune favored me. I had been reading until a late hour, and had fallen asleep in a softly cushioned chair, when a quick rap on my door awakened me, and Mrs. Sampson's voice asked: "Are you awake?"

I opened the door at once.

"I saw your light was burning," Mrs. Sampson said. "You told me you were studying medicine. Do come to Mrs. Carter and see if you can do anything for her before her own physician comes. I have sent for him, but it is a long distance to go."

Just one glance at the sufferer told me she could not wait for aid from a "long distance." She lay in an apoplectic fit that threatened instant death. I went to work at once, opened a vein in the throat, applied the usual remedies, and had the satisfaction of bringing her back from the very confines of the grave, before her own doctor arrived. All through the quick, active treatment, I had accepted almost mechanically the help of Elsie Lennox's ready hands, giving my orders rather sharply in the stress of danger, and thinking nothing of the girl I had learned to love, until the danger over, the case taken in hand by Mrs. Carter's physician, I became conscious of a deadly white face and shaking hands beside me.

"Drink this!" I said, mixing a stimulant and putting it to her lips.

"I am not familiar with sickness," Elsie said, presently, in a tone of apology. "I thought she was dying."

"She was dangerously near it," I said, "and you had the right to be alarmed even if you were familiar with sickness. But the danger is now over."

"It was well you were so near," Dr. Hall said, joining us. "Bless me, it is Harry Bell!"

I had already recognized one of the professors of the university where I had taken my diploma, and we shook hands cordially. A little professional chat followed, as I escorted him to the door, and on returning to Mrs. Carter's room I undertook to be ready to respond to any further call upon my services during the night.

Dr. Hall must have spoken in my favor to Mrs. Carter, for the barriers between us were suddenly thrown down, and I found myself admitted to a friendship I had quite despaired of gaining. Everything favored me, and in the intimacy that followed my whole heart passed into Elsie's keeping. She filled my ideal of womanly sweetness, bearing the caprices and bad temper of her cousin with a gentle patience that had not one atom of servility in it; showing in her quiet conversation a cultured, intellectual and refined taste; using her accomplishments to amuse Mrs. Carter, never for display of her own power. Toward me she was always courteous, pleasant, even friendly—no more. Never se[illegible]er alone. I could not plead my love, and I feared to startle her by writing, having no thread of encouragement [illegible] build a hope upon.

Three happy months, happy in spite of my hopes and fears, passed away, and then I was hastily summoned away to the death bed of a near relative. After a week's absence I returned to Mr. Samson's to find Mrs. Carter alone and mysteriously reticent about her cousin's absence.

It is not a pleasant recollection to me, the months that followed. In answer to a plain question, Mrs Carter flatly refused to tell me where Elsie had gone, and I fully, miserably realized that my whole life's happiness had been bound up in the hope of winning her. I traveled about, always returning to Mrs. Samson's in the vain hope that Elsie might have come there also. I was not fond of my profession, which I had studied to please my uncle, I had tried to like it while he lived, but when he died, and there was no one to please, I found my disgust for sores and sickness, my shrinking from the sight of pain, were stronger than my desire to heal or cure. I know that is a humiliating confession, but it is true.

So I moped about, read a great deal, hovered on the brink of many a pitfall, and drew back, and a year had passed, when one morning Mrs. Carter said to me:

"Why did you deceive me?" she asked abruptly.

I stared at her in honest amazement.

"I thought you were a poor man," she said, "poking up in that little miserable third story room. I had no idea that you were Harvey Bell's son, and worth hundreds of thousands. It was only yesterday I heard who you are. I am a worldly old woman, you will tell me. Well, I am; and being worldly and mecenary, and all that, I sent Elsie Lennox out of your way, when—was I a blind old idiot as well, or were you in love with her?"

"I love her with all my heart!" I answered.

"Humph! why didn't you tell me you had sufficient money to support a wife? I sent her off to be governess in a friend's family. How could I know her miserable scamp of a father would send for her? Gracious me! There's a pretty mess now! John—that is, Mr. Lennox, Elsie's father—is down in Texas, dying, and writes to me for money. Whatever he did with all he muddled away, he didn't take any with him; and there's that child alone with him! I can't go. You can see I'm not fit for such a journey in mid winter. John may be dead now. Bless me! I'm half distracted. Do you want to go to them? She is the child of a bankrupt, who made a disgraceful failure. I don't choose to tell any lies about them. She has not a cent, and she will not have my money, because it all goes to my husband's nephew, whether I will it so or not. You shan't say I deceived you about her. I suppose she would want to choke me if I tell you she is fond of you. I knew it, reserved as she was. You need not imagine she put on love-sick airs about you, and gushed to me; but eyes and cheeks are tell-tales sometimes. Well, are you going, or are you disgusted with the whole business?"

"I am going as soon as you are kind enough to give me the address."

"Here is John's letter. Likely enough he is more scared than hurt, and not so ill as he thinks. There! Good bye. Give my love to Elsie, and if I am mistaken, and she doesn't care for you, will you bring her back to me?"

"I will. I'll start to day."

John Lennox was not mistaken. I found my darling in a wretched hut near Galveston, with a servant trying to console her as sobbed over her father's corpse. I had stopped in St. Louis on my journey, and persuaded a cousin of my own—a gentle widow, past middle age—to accompany me to Texas, [illegible] to her tenderness and care I left the desolate girl until after the funeral. It was then decided she should accept my cousin's hospitality, and we went to St Louis a mourning party, but with one heart full of eager hope.

I did not win my darling easy, for she was crushed by the knowledge that her father's failure was one of exposed fraud. But she loved me, and to that love I trusted, and not in vain.

We came again to Mrs. Samson's after two years spent in Europe, where my wife left all her sorrows and troubles, coming home a happy loving wife, and proud, fond mother.

Mrs. Carter had engaged a suit of rooms for us opposite her own, and seems to have renewed her youth and found a new block of sociability. It is difficult to believe the smiling, loving woman who greets us now when we cross the hall, is the same fat old tyrant who made Elsie's life miserable when she lived in the third story, and I cast loving, despairing looks [illegible] her across the hall.

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent,

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 20.—Senator Voorhees in a rattling speech on a resolution offered by him as to the agricultural depression of the country, gave the republican idol—protection—a terrible drubbing. He said a protective tariff is a curse and not a blessing. "The farmers" he continued, "of the United States do not receive on an average more than ten cents a bushel for their corn, fifty cents for their wheat and from two to three cents a pound for their hogs.

The time will come, at no far distant day, when the farmer will look upon the proposition to tax him and his wife and children for the protection and benefit of other people as he would look upon a law of Congress to establish the army worm and the weevle on his wheat or to infect his cattle with murrain and his hogs with cholera. Every pretense of a home market for the farmer is a fraud and every pretense of taxing wheat, oats and potatoes, for his benefit is a cheat and a sham. It is not orious and self-evident truth that the tariff, as it now stands, increases the farmers expenses account from 35 to 100 per cent on every implement with which he toils, XXX. I do not see how the hand of a farmer can hold a republican ticket at the next Presidential election. In the last 25 years the improved farm lands of the United States have decreased in value at least 33 per cent.

A Letter From Green Bank.

ED. POCAHONTAS TIMES:

A strange code of morals has lately developed in this neighborhood, which although confined to a very few individuals, the former good standing of the parties implicated warrants the writer in calling attention to the subject, lest others be mislead by their example. On Feb. 1st, H. A. Yeager, had the misfortune to loose his saddle pockets containing nearly all his papers. The pockets were lost between Dunmore and Green Bank. Diligent search was immediately instituted, and the papers advertised at all public places in the neighborhood, but without avail. Imagine the surprise of the public when after expiration of nearly one month, and the owner had recovered as far as possible the bonds, &c., lost, it was ascertained the saddle pockets and papers had during all this time been concealed at the house of a prominent member of the church. They having been found in the road early the next morning after being lost, by his son and son in law, and they were holding them for reward. To make matters worse the aforesaid church member admits that he knew, owning all that time to whom the papers belonged; that he had seen him and talked with him during the time, but that he wanted his children to make some money out of it, and hence did not let the fact be known, but was watching the POCAHONTAS TIMES, expecting a large reward would be offered, and not until he was informed that the parties holding them would be liable to criminal prosecution, and that the papers would not be used by any one other than the owner, was any effort made to discover the owner, who they already knew. Then a notice was put up during the night, advertising the papers, but requiring proof, before they would be turned over. Before these facts were fully known to the owner, they succeeded in extorting five dollars for their delivery

Now a word to the law in such cases: The Courts have always held that if a party finding property know the owner of it, if there be any mark upon it, or any other circumstances known to the finder, by which the owner can be ascertained and then instead of restoring it, he converts it to his own use, or conseals it with the intention to restore it only when a reward is offered for it, as in this case, he is guilty of larceny. The courts have also uniformly held, that the only cases in which a party finding of another can be justified in holding it, is when the owner can not be found, or when it may be fairly said that the owner has abandoned it. These parties knew the owner, knew the property was not abandoned. The party who held them met and talked with the owner frequently during the time he held in consealment, and yet failed to make it known because he wanted to make money out of it, makes it a case without a paralel in this county.

I have called attention to the law on the subject as a matter of information to those who might be mislead by the act of one who claims to take the bible as his guide, and to be a follower of the Savior, whose teachings were to "do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Mar. 6-4t. Printer's fee $8.75.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for re-election at the next election as Clerk of the Circuit and County Courts of Pocahontas county.

Feeling very grateful for past favors, and soliciting your support at the next election, I am,

Most respectfully,
JOHN J. BEARD.

HOME NEWS

—Have you secured good seed?

—Get a good grip on Spring work.

—Attorney L. M. McClintic, is on the sick list.

—Time to fix up and oil the harness.

—Mr. John Warwick, of near Edray, was in town Monday.

—Start the ploughs soon as expedient.

—How as to asparagus and pieplant?

—Girls, arrange for the flower garden.

—Beware of foul seed and poor tools.

—Do your daily duty and don't croak.

—Levi Gay, Esq., of Marlinton, was in to see us Tuesday.

—Will Gibson, Esq., of Frost, was in to see us this week.

—Rice Moore, Esq. and wife, have returned from their bridal tour.

—Swecker sells McClintic's flour at Dunmore.

—Grow plenty of small fruit this year.

—Head work now saves hand work later.

—Prune early for growth and late for fruit.

—Early Spring lambs bring "cash money."

—See that your horses have plenty of exercise—and feed, too.

—Several lumbermen, off Mr. D. O'Connell's drive, are stopping in town.

—Jacob Boner, merchant, was in Staunton, the first of this week, buying groceries.

—The family of Col. D. A. Fisher, we are sorry to say, are no better.

—Not every new machine or tool is necessarily an improvement, although the agent may tell you so.

—Miss Lillie Friel's school near Traveler's Repose, closed a few days ago, and she has returned home.

—If you want to seed land to clover sown with oats, sow the oats very thin—some say the thinner the better.

—Double shovel plows, genuine Malta, and the Brown. Also full line of blades and steel shapes. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—Mr. H. M. Lockridge, was at Buenna Vista, last week. Mr. Lockridge has invested in several lots in that booming young city.

—Oliver Chill plows and repairs direct from factory, no imitation goods. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—Mr. John A. McNeel, of Knapp's creek, was in to see us, and gave us an encouraging word and a few dollars last week.

—We had to cut, and leave out some of our communications this week on account of our limited space. Write again.

—Died, Rev. Jas. E. Moore, at his home, near Mill Point, on Saturday 22nd inst., in the 79th year of his age.

—The celebrated Simonds saws, for both Pine and hard woods. Also tested coil chains a speciality. Cant hooks and cant hook steel and iron. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—Rev. J. L. Henderson and wife, of Amsterdam, Va., were in town Monday. They are visiting her father Mr. A. W. Moore, on Knapp's creek.

—Several new subscribers this week.

—The first quarterly meeting for the Pocahontas Circuit, M. E. Church will be held at Frost, on the second Saturday and Sunday in April.

—Silver steel plows, will stay in gravel without any trouble and run lighter and take more ground than any plow on the market. Simms & Workman, Ronceverte.

—The best and surest dye to color the beard brown or black, as may be desired, is Buckingham's Dye for the Whiskers. It never fails.

—Married, today (Wednesday), near Lobelia, Miss Felicia Seldomridge to Mr. A. J. McCoy, and Miss Effie A. McCoy to Mr. Lincoln Cochran. THE TIMES extends congratulations.

—We understand that Mr. Wm. H. Hull of Green Bank, will be a candidate for Clerk of the County and Circuit Courts. Mr. Hull, is a mighty good man, and if elected, no doubt would fill the office with competency and ability.

—When Macbeth ironally asked, Canst thou minister to a mind diseased?" he little knew that mankind would one day be blessed with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In purifying the blood, this powerful alterative gives tone and strength to every function and faculty of the system.

—For the cure of colds, coughs, and all derangements of the respiratory organs, no other medicine is so reliable as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. It relieves the asthmatic and consumptive, even in advanced stages of disease, and has saved inumerable lives.

—In this issue will be found the announcement of Mr. Jno. J. Beard for re-election, for Clerk of the Circuit and County Courts. As Mr Beard has filled this responsible office for the past two terms, without fault, and is known by nearly every voter in the county, it is unnecessary to add more.

—A. L. Nottingham, Esq., who has been in Montana and other parts of the northwest for about seven years, stayed all night in Huntersville, last Saturday night, on his way home to Green Bank.

—D. H. Garber, Esq., of Marlinton, was in to see us Monday. He informed us that he will soon locate at Elkins. We are sorry to lose Mr. Garber from our county, as he is an excellent gentleman, and such as our county needs.

—Martin Maden, Esq., of the Buckhannon Marble and Granite Works, of Buckhannon, W. Va., will call on the people of this county in the near future with prices on Monuments and Head Stones, that will be so much lower on the best grades of Marble and Granite than you are accustomed to, that it will be greatly to your interests to see him. They warrant all work first-class in every respect. Mar. 13-4t.

Douthard's Creek Items.

More rain and mud.

Mr. C. T. Seebert, of Rockbridge Co., Va., brought out a fine lot of cattle for his grass on Knapp's creek.

H. Lee, White, is up at Sunset this week, sowing timothy and clover for Z. Gaulett.

Rev. W. T. Price, preached an interesting sermon at Sunset, school house, Sunday morning at 11 o'clock.

The sick are a little better this week. Hope they will be able to be out again soon.

News is scarce this week; so the Ed. will have to be contented with little.

PEGGY JANE.

Mercie's equestrian bronze statue of Gen. Robt. E. Lee has been accepted, and will be shipped to Richmond at once, and will probably arrive there early in April. The unveiling ceremonies will take place on May 29th.

Frost Freaks.

C. B. Swecker, Esq., of Dunmore, was in town this week.

Mess. Wise Herold and Glen Beckman, passed through town with a fine drove of cattle for their Highland pastures.

Will Gibson, reports the road in a fearful condition between here and Millboro.

A. J. Shinnabary's health has so far improved that he spent a day or two in Frost this week.

Dr. Gwinn and son Harry, were in town this week, looking after his interests.

The industries of Frost are as well represented as that of any other village in the County.

Highlanders boom their county, as the banner stock county of the State; but the Recorder has been silent since the report of the increase of Mr. Moore's stock.

Hope THE TIMES reporters are at home this week and will use their pens.

KATE.

Marlinton Movements.

DEAR TIMES: The streams have been quite flush, the past fortnight.

Quite a number of rafts have moved off.

Commodore Peters, made a most imposing display on a double raft last Thursday morning. There were two saddled horses on board, that muched their oats, and seemed to enjoy the situation immensely.

There was an exciting race, the day before after a dog raft that had taken french leave for Ronceverte, with a valuable cable, an axe and two cant hooks in its possession. The fugitive was overtaken, but the axe and one cant hook had been cast upon the waters, and will not be found for many days, if ever.

Capt. D. O'Connell's drive passed here Sunday.

Applicants for service on the census Bureau, are very numerous. How greatly must be the love of our country, among the millions of her sons, as so many stand ready to serve her in any capacity, whatever, so plows and muskets, are not mentioned.

Mr. A. M. McGlaughlin, has on hand three or four hundred nice sheep, that have wintered very well indeed.

Much to the regret of many friends, the Messrs Garber, have arranged to leave Marlin's Bottom, for Elkin's city, where they expect to open store, and make it the interest of their Pocahontas friends, to deal with them, on the matter of home supplies.

Oh dear, and oh me, me!
What can the matter be?
It's because Mr. Jim Skinner
Must be a cute little sinner,
Poking fun at Goff and the Preachers,
And the Brushy Run Teachers.

Like your correspondent Kate, I want the TIMES to be the best paper in Pocahontas county, and far ahead of the counties that have no paper of their own. Let all who can, write.

Died, Saturday, the 15th of March, 1890, of whooping cough, la grippe and pneumonia, combined, Bettie Wilson, aged 8 months and 12 days, and on Tuesday the 18th of March, Frank A., aged 3 years, 8 months and 17 days, children of Benj J. and Ella Varner.

Little Bettie, was delicate from her birth, and never gave evidence of long life; but she was a loveable child, and never was known to cry.

Dear Frank, was a remarkable child. He was a closer observer of men and things, than very many grown people, and had a wonderful recollection of names and faces. He was not fond of the society of other children; but when in their company he was kind and playful, and one of the most obedient of children. He sought the company of grown persons, and was an attentive listener. When drawn out in conversation, his talk was not that of a child; but like one of mature thought. Strangers who have met him, and heard him talk have said that he would not live to manhood, that his mind was developing too fast.

Alas! he has passed away, and—oh! so soon.

Cecie, the eldest, and only child left of these parents, is stricken down with the same combination of diseases, but her physician has hope of her recovery.

The parents of these children have the sincerest sympathy of the whole community in their sad affliction.

There is serious sickness also, in the families of John W. and S. S. Varner, of a similar character to those the above children died with.

PUBLIC SALE OF VALUABLE

Lands in Pocahontas County.

In pursuance of two decrees of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, rendered at the June term, 1889, in the chancery cause

C. L. Austin &c.,
vs.
W. F. Arbogast &c.,

I will on

MONDAY THE 7TH DAY OF APRIL next, offer for sale at public auction in front of the Court house of Pocahontas County, two tracts of land, one of [illegible] acres and the other of 1,320 acres. These tracts of land are situate on the Alleghany mountain, are known as lots No. 9 and 10, in the big survey and are valuable for the timber thereon.

TERMS:

Cash in hand to pay costs of the two suits and the costs of sale and for the balance, the purchasers will be required to execute bonds with good security payable in six and twelve months, bearing interest from day of sale and the legal title to be retained as ultimate security.

L. H. STEPHENSON,
Commissioner.

I, John J. Beard, Clerk of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, do certify that L. H. Stephenson, Com'r has given the bond as required by said decrees.

She Wanted an Epetaph.

Silence sat on every chair in the office. The editor in-chief was sharpening the editorial axe (i. e., whittling his blue pencil), the managing editor was increasing his vocabulary by studying, for the first time in his career, Webster's unabridged, while the professional poet was swiftly grinding out long lines of rhyme in which such jingles as "sin," "gin," "din," "come," "some," "rum," "spoke," "joke," "broke," were clearly visible.

The door opened and a woman entered. She was becomingly attired in a black suit, green goggles, a pink nose, and heavy shoes. Producing a large handkerchief, which was somewhat the worse for wear and tear, and allowed a Roman nose to protrude through a fat hole in its middle, she blew a sonorous blast, and remarked in a basso voice:

"I was sent here by a young gentleman with a slight moustache and eye glasses. I want a professional poet."

The rhyme twister flushed, rose from his chair, and bowed. "I have the honor to be that person," he said. "What can I do for you? Pray be seated."

"We've lost a noble boy of twenty years. He was pizened. I want an obituary poem about four lines long to put upon his tombstone. We can't pay more than five shillings."

"All right madam." He dashed his hand through his hair and his pencil over a large pad, and handed her the following:

"He lived below but twenty years,
Some poisonous drug cut short his story;
This stone is moistened with our tears
And he, dear child, has gone to glory."

She read it, sobbed, re-read it, sobbed again, and then collecting herself, said:

"How beautiful! how pathetic! But it don't quite suit. You see his father was a dirty Jew, and we want that brought in."

The word slinger sighed, and then jerked off this gem:

"His ugly father was an unwashed Jew,
And he, my son, at twenty years of age,
Through some fell poison bade us all adieu,
And sought in heaven his endless heritage."

The dame wiped off her glasses, went through the same pyrotechnics, and then murmured:

"Ever so much better. That's almost exactly what we want. Make it, please, a little rougher on the old wretch, and put in all that lovely sentiment you have written."

The mechanical Byron groaned, and drops of perspiration fell from his brow as he penned this touching style:

"Here lies my son, whose bilious eyes,
An unwashed member of Judas's race,
Did poison in a fit of ire,
And clouded his sad death with dark disgrace;
But God took pity on his own,
And placed my boy upon a golden throne."

The melancholy female read the treasure, kissed it, offered to kiss the Milton—who modestly but forcibly refused—paid down the cash, and stalked forth into the street.

Don't Know Adam.

As Artemus Ward was once traveling in the cars, dreading to be bored, and feeling miserable, a man approached him, sat down and said:

"Did you hear the last thing on Horace Greeley?"

"Greeley? Greeley?" said Artemus. "Horace Greeley? Who is he?"

The man was quiet about five minutes. Pretty soon he said:

"George Francis Train is kicking up a good deal of a row over in England; do you think they will put him in a bastile?"

"Train? Train? George Francis Train?" said Artemus, solemnly. "I never heard of him."

This ignorance kept the man quiet for fifteen minutes; then he said; then he said:

"What do you think about General Grant's chances for the Presidency?" Do you think they will run him?" Do you think they will run him?"

"Grant? Grant? Hang it, man," said Artemus, "you appear to know more strangers than any man I ever saw."

The man was furious; he walked up the car, but at last came back and said:

"You big ignoramus, did you ever hear of Adam?"

Artemus looked up and said: "What was his other name?"

THE BOWSERS.

"Now for an evening of solid comfort!" said Mr. Bowser the other evening as he fell into an easy chair and cut the pages of a magazine. "Mrs. Bowser, do you ever realize how blessed we are?"

"Yes, indeed."

"While others fall by the wayside we are spared."

"While others quarrel and bicker and seek the divorce courts, we love the stronger every day."

"Yes."

He got up and came over and kissed me, and upon returning to his chair seemed lost in reflection for a moment then, he continued:

"How curious life is! Do you remember the day I first saw you?"

"I shall never forget it."

"I was on horseback you remember, and you stood on the veranda of your father's house."

"You are a trifle mistaken, dear. The horse had thrown you off into a mudhole, and I shall never forget the picture you presented as you approached the house. At first I took you for—"

"What! A horse throw me off!" he interrupted.

"Certainly. Don't you remember how father—"

"Mrs. Bowser, are you crazy? I was never thrown from a horse in my life! I'd like to see the horse which could throw me off! You must be thinking of some one else."

"Why, dear, you lost your watch in the mud, and father fished it out. Don't you remember how our negro Tom scraped the mud off you?"

"Not by a long shot! No nigger ever scraped me down! You must be thinking of that yellow-haired dude you used to go with."

We were both silent for a time and I hoped it was the last of it. My experience, although dating back over a few years only, has satisfied me that nothing aggravates a husband more than to bring up the silly things he said and did during his courtship. It seems to be a raw spot with the majority of them after the honeymoon is over. But Mr. Bowser was not satisfied. After four or five minutes he broke out with:

"It's curious what a dunce a man can make of himself with his eyes wide open."

"Yes?"

"The idea that I should ever fall in love with you!"

"Or I with you!"

"He glared at me over the top of his book and there was another painful silence, broken at last by his saying:

"Well, I'll admit that I was in love; but I flatter myself that I didn't exhibit any schoolboy nonsense."

"You were just like any other young man in love, Mr. Bowser. They have always been that way, and always will be, and it's no discredit to them.

"Do you mean to say I 'mooned' around like a calf?" he demanded.

"I don't know how calves 'moon,' as you term it, but you wanted to hold my hand, put your arm around me and—"

"Hold your hand—never!"

"But you did!"

"Never—never!"

"Mr. Bowser, I have one of my old diaries. Wait until I get it."

"Not much! You can't produce no old diaries nor forged documents on me! I anticipated an evening of solid comfort and you can see how it has turned out! Is it any wonder that so many husbands seek the saloons and gambling houses of an evening?"

At this moment the cook called me out to ask what she should prepare for breakfast, and a quarter of an hour later when when I returned to the back parlor Mr. Bowser seemed deeply interested in his reading. I was glad of this, for I felt a bit conscious stricken but I scarcely got seated when he asked:

"Was Emma Davis here to-day?"

"Yes."

"How was she looking?"

"Very well. I wanted her to stay until you came home, but she had to go at four o'clock. She asked to be remembered to you."

"Yes. I hope she has fully forgiven me."

"What for, Mr. Bowser?"

"You know."

"I haven't the least idea."

"Ha! ha! ha! What dissemblers woman are. It was always a sore spot with you, though you would never admit it. How you do blush—ha! ha! ha!"

"Mr. Bower, what do you refer to?"

"Why, there's no doubt that the dear girl once foundly expected to be Mrs. Bowser."

"Nonsense!"

"What?"

"Nonsense!"

"You say that simply for revenge, but I know better. We were as well as engaged when I met you."

"Trash, sir! She was engaged to Jack ... saw ... as so... vy. has ... "M... got ... his c... you ... "I ... "W... coul... band... "I ... "I ... "I ... "I ... som... I w... you ... I ... of c... whi... wer... erat... with... sta... " ... " ... the... boo... Sun... two old receipt books of no particular value. I found every thing turned topsy-turvy and I knew what you had been up to."

"Mrs. Bowser, I—"

"Wait! Let us look up the Emma Davis matter. Here it is. Under date of the 10th of July I write: 'Dear Emma was over to-day to congratulate me on my engagement, though she added that if Bowser was the last man on earth she would not have married him. She says his hair reminds her of pumpkins and that his legs seem to be badly warped. The dear girl also—'"

"Stop!" shouted Mr. Bowser, his face as white as death.

"Yes, dear, but you made a certain assertion. I want to disprove it. I—"

"Mrs. Bowser, I planned for an evening of solid comfort. You have made it an evening of torture and regret. If I never spend another evening at home you alone will be to blame for it."

"But you—"

"Stop right here. This is the last. The worm has turned. To-morrow I go!"

But he is with me yet, and I have no fear but that we shall live out our lives together.

ON JUG RIDGE.

A Wedding at the Bensions—A Great Society Event.

The marriage of the lovely Miss Angeline Benson, daughter of our popular citizen Peter Benson, was solemnized Thursday afternoon in a very gay manner. Ridge society has been looking forward to this event for some time, and its realization was all their anticipatory dreams had pictured it. The groom was Mr. Wagner Wallace, one of our best-known young men. "Wag" never looked happier in his life, and well he might. Ah, "Wag," you are a lucky dog to thus capture such a charming bride! The scribe's warmest congratulations are extended to you and yours, and you have our best wishes for happiness and prosperity as you journey [illegible] down the matrimonial sea!

To dance after the wedding was a jolly affair and will long be remembered by our best people. It is hardly expected that any first-class social event can come off in these parts without meeting with ungentlemanly interference from the vulgar crowd who call themselves the best society (heaven save the mark!) ... Stover's Mill. Even a wedding ...ot appeal to their sense of de... and for good reason. En... of the brilliant event at Bensons, at which was as...ed fair women and brave ... they gathered about the ... like so many hyenas and ... the welkin ring with their un... yells and catcalls. Their un... references to your correspon... are passed by with withering ... Whether or not we changed ...ocks for the wedding is none ...eir affairs. It is presumed we ... the usages of good society or ...ould not have been there. ...ing at it in its most charitable ... it was an impertinent ques... to shout through the open win... and we take this occasion to ...hat the wretches who did it do ... know the first principles of ... constitutes the true gentle...

...he bride's costume was tasteful ... becoming, made largely, we understand, by her own fair hands, ... the remarks of these would-be ...al leaders of Stover's Mill con...ing it were out of place and in...ing in the extreme. "Get onto de Jug Ridge weddin' slippers!" "Smell de bar's grease on de bride's flowin' ringlets!" were expressions that these low ignoramuses seemed to think was the essence of wit and good humor. We do not so regard them.

Two or three of the better people from Stover's Mill were present at the wedding by invitation, and their efforts to excuse the conduct of the gang on the outside led, as a matter of course, to some high words. Luckily their nefarious attempt to get our fiddler intoxicated was discovered and nipped in the bud. Soon after this discovery one of the supposedly better people from the Mill was promptly knocked through a dining room window. He had the effrontery to want his wedding present handed out to him through the window, but the bride, with true spirit, declined to yield it, and instead hurled a chair leg at his offending head. Served him right, say we.

The gallant young bridegroom, slipped out on the porch and announced in no uncertain tones that he could whip one at a time, any two curs in the crowd, and it is noticed that his peremptory challenge was not accepted notwithstanding he offered every inducement in the way of fair play. The Stover's Mill yellow hammers bark a great deal about their fighting qualities, but with very few exceptions there has been no social event on the Ridge this season when they did not get the everlasting daylights knocked right out of them, and the same can be done again. In proof of our assertion, we have only to cite the Brayfogle nuptials, the Dobson dance and the Appelgate taffy-pull. Their game now appears to be to lay out in the grass and howl until such time as the beautiful chocolate color fades out of the vicinity of their eyesight.

A thin, careworn-looking man, having a pencil and a tablet in his hand, called at a house on 2d avenue the other day and said to the lady as she opened the door:

"Madam, I am canvassing for subscriptions for a poor family. Will you put your name down for a small sum?"

"Is it a worthy family?"

"Yes, indeed."

"Do you know them personally?"

"I do, ma'am."

"And they are really in need?"

"They certainly are."

"Very well—I'll give you a quarter."

She put her name down and handed him the money, and he had reached the gate when she called him back and said:

"It has just occurred to me that this might be your own family."

"Exactly, ma'am. It is my family, but modesty forbade me to say so. I am not one who seeks to push himself forward, though I would doubtless get along better if I was. Thank you, ma'am. I know the family, and I assure you it is all right—all right!"

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON, D. C., March27.—Senator Sherman's alleged anti-trust bill which his republican colleague, Senator Platt, says is a sham and a delusion and nothing less than a humbugging of the people, has been overloaded with amendments by the Senate. Of course everybody here knows that this bill, if it was a law, would not hurt a single trust. Mr Sherman himself has admitted that the bill is only intended as a warning to the trust, and he might have added, that it would also if passed prevent the passage of any other measure that might be introduced with the intention to really injure the trusts. Perhaps that is what it is really intended for. Congress can break up every trust existing in this country inside of ninety days whenever it pleases to do so. All that is necessary is to remove the tariff from the article dealt in by the several trusts.

Senator Chandler is one of that class of republicans who believe that this Government exists for their special benefit. Having recently put a man, who was his private secretary, into the Navy department as chief clerk of the bureaus, he now has the cheek to introduce a bill to increase that chief clerk's salary from $1,800 to $2,500 a year.

The House passed the Chicago World's Fair bill with amendments providing that women should be represented upon the board of managers and that the fair should be held from April to October 1893. There is no doubt of the early passage of the bill by the Senate. Circumstances have overcome whatever serious opposition there existed in that body.

The republicans of the Senate have struck a streak of industry and agreed to meet daily at 11 o'clock instead of 12. They have also decided in caucus that the Montana steal shall be called up on Monday and remain before the Senate until the theft is consummated, to be followed in regular order by the dependent pension bill, the administrative customs bill the land forfeiture bill, the Jones silver bill, and the bills for the admission of new States. An attempt was made at this caucus to bind the Senators to support a Federal election bill, but it failed most ignominiously. It is only by the aid of king caucus that a Federal Election bill can be carried in either House or Senate.

The House committee on Territories has practically "turned down" the applications of New Mexico and Arizona to become States, at the present session, by deciding to postpone further consideration of bills for their admission.

Bills to allow Gen. Crook's widow a pension of $2,000 a year have been introduced in House and Senate.

The republicans of the Ways and Means committee of the House have not been able to stand the pressure brought to bear upon them by the announcement of the items in their tariff bill. Already they have decided that hides and raw silk shall go back upon the free list, and the sugar people are demanding with a prospect of success that the cut on sugar shall not exceed 25 per cent. It is impossible to say how soon the bill will get before the House. It has not yet been discussed by the full committee.

The president and secretary of the Virginia Republican League, of this city, have been arrested under the civil service law prohibiting of campaign contributions from Government employes. It was done with the intention of making these test cases in order to get a judicial construction of the law.

The Civil Service Commission, not satisfied with the largely increased appropriation it had already asked for, has submitted a supplementary estimate to Congress asking for $37,000 more.

Secretary Proctor wants the Pension bureau transferred from the Interior to the War department. He says the work could be done there cheaper.

The republican members of the House committee on Elections must have had some pretty severe twinges of conscience of late. This week they have decided two contested election cases in favor of the sitting democrats.

General bunkum has occupied the floor of the Senate for the greater part of the present week. No legislative body on earth is farther from the people than the Senate of the United States, but that does not prevent the liberal use of platitudes about the "dear people."

The House has passed the bill for the admission of Wyoming Territory as a State.

Secretary Windom's silver bill has been favorably reported to the House, but it has been radically amended.

The Pan American Congress has reported in favor of the adoption of an International silver coin.

J. A. Bing, a young lawyer, of Logan Co., was drowned in Twelve Pole river, on the 24th inst.

Queen Victoria, on the Dover boat, bound for Aix les Bains, was in great good humor, with her three coachmen, nine grooms, eight horses, one donkey, three carriages, 72 trunks, three special beds, a special cooking stove, wine, two doctors, one surgeon, one surgeon for the Princess Beatrice, three ladies in waiting, nine women servants, one lord, two equerries, seven dogs and Prince Henry of Battenberg, whom she addressed as "lieber Heinrich," in voice loud enough to be distinctly heard and distinctly convey the impression that he is once more restored to the love of his royal mother in law.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for re election at the next election as Clerk of the Circuit and County Courts of Pocahontas county.

Feeling very grateful for past favors, and soliciting your support at the next election, I am,

Most respectfully,
JOHN J. BEARD.

To the voters of Pocahontas County.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for Clerk of the Circuit and County Courts of Pocahontas County at the election to be held on the 4th day of November next, and, if elected, I pledge myself to discharge the duties of said offices to the best of my ability.

Your support is solicited.

Respectfully,
S. L. BROWN.

HOME NEWS

—Circuit Court next week.

—Read Jacob Boner's new ad.

—Every body come in to see us when you come to court.

—A few trials before justice Grose lately.

—Announcements for office must be paid in advance.

—More new subscribers this week, and still room for plenty more.

—The deepest snow of the season fell Monday.

—Have you a supply of eggs for easter?—if not you had better be a hustling, its only three days off.

—Attorney L. M. McClintic, who has been on the sick list for several days, is improving.

—Died, Mr. Peter Sharp, of Frost, on last Saturday morning, aged about 60 years.

—George Wagner, Esq., has been sick for the past few days, but not seriously.

—Joe McNeel, Esq., and wife, of Academy, were visiting her parents Saturday and Sunday.

—There was more real winter weather in March than the rest of the winter.

—Jas. W. Warwick, Esq., has returned from a several days trip in Va.

—The itching of the scalp, falling of the hair resulting in baldness, are often caused by dandruff, which may be cured by using Hall's Hair Renewer.

—If your cough keeps you awake and restless by night, take Ayer's Cherry Pectoral and obtain immediate relief. This remedy allays inflammation, heals the pulmonary organs, induces sleep and restores health. The sooner you begin the better.

—"When the spring time comes," we usually find ourselves drowsy and exhausted, owing to the impure and sluggish state of the blood. To remedy this trouble, take Ayer's Sarsaparilla, the most powerful, yet safe and economical, blood purifier in existence.

—We received a letter from Mr. H. A. Yeager, of Green Bank, in regard to the communication in last week's TIMES about the loosing and finding of his saddle pockets, in which he says he had satisfactory explanation from the parties, and he believes there were no criminal intent in concealing them.

—In this issue will be found the announcement of S. L. Brown, Esq., for clerk of the County and Circuit courts. Mr. Brown has been a citizen of our town for several years, and we know him to be thoroughly competent, and we believe if he is elected he will fill the office with the ability and accommodation that no one whose may cast his vote for him will have cause to regret it.

—E. H. Moore, Esq. of Academy, was in to see us Monday, and showed us letters from several influential gentlemen, urging him to announce himself a candidate for clerk of the Circuit and County Courts. What we can say of Mr. Moore, is, that we have known him all our life, and know him to be competent and well worthy of the position to which he aspires.

—One Nathan Green, who is quite familiar with the inside of our jail, was arrested last Friday, and after a hearing before justice Grose, was locked up to await the action of the grand jury for breaking into the meat house of Mr. Andrew Dilley and stealing several pieces of bacon. Wilam Wanless was also arrested as accessory and gave bond in the sum of $500 to answer indictment.

—Martin Maden, Esq., of the Buckhannon Marble and Granite Works, of Buckhannon, W. Va., will call on the people of this county in the near future with prices on Monuments and Head Stones, that will be so much lower on the best grades of Marble and Granite than you are accustomed to, that it will be greatly to your interests to see him. They warrant all work first-class in every respect Mar. 13-4t.

—L. J. Pyles, Esq., whose wife and child were up at Green Bank, last week, and he, having cause to believe, as he says, that she was preparing to leave him and start for Dak., where her brother is, swore out a warrant and had her arrested and brought to this place for trial for the recovery of the child, and finding that a justice had no jurisdiction over the case, he stole the child out of the hotel, and skipped over the hill; his wife seeing him started in pursuit, but failed to catch him. The next day he came back to town, and meeting, they reconsidered their solemn promise at the marriage altar "for better or for worse &c.," and went to their home.

Driftwood Siftings.

A TERRIBLE DISASTER.

Two Hundred People Killed in Louisville.

Shortly after 12 o'clock a. m., on the 28th inst., tornado swept over Louisville, Ky., wrecking two or three hundred houses and killing two hundred people. The wind came from the southwest. Union depot, at the foot of 7th street, was lifted from its foundation and turned over into the raging torent of the Ohio river.

A train of cars making up for the Louisville Southern road went over with the building.

Falls City Hall, west of market street was wrecked. In the hall were over one hundred people, and but few of them escaped alive. Many buildings after falling caught fire and the inmates were burned. All streets were blockaded with debris of falling buildings or telegraph and electric wires.

The Missing Pig.

Mr. Enoch W. Jordan, a prominent farmer of Lee County, tells the following snake story: He was walking over his plantation when he came to a sow which had a fine litter of pigs. He found one of them absent. Going a short distance further he overtook a huge rattlesnake which he promptly dispatched. He noticed that it seemed very large and was apparently gorged. Cutting it open, out jumped the pig, which, as soon as released from its close quarters, took to its heels and ran home.—Atlanta Constitution.

A CAVALRY CHARGE.

We had been held in reserve on the second day at Gettysburg so long that men and horses became nervous and afraid, writes and ex Confederate. My horse was an old veteran, who would drop his head and pick at the green grass with a battery firing on either side of us, but as the moments dragged away on this occasion he evinced a woman's nervousness. I looked down the lines and saw that the alignment was constantly being broken by the horses backing up or forging ahead. They could see the fighting to the right and in front, and the smoke from the Union battery to the left and in front of us drove back and over us, and the horses breathed it in and blew it out of their nostrils in gasps.

A tremor of excitement—a sort of shiver—ran down the line.

The wind had shifted a bit to blow the smoke to our left, and down across the meadows we saw the Confederate cavalry forming, with the green woods for a back ground. Jeb Stuart's men were there—Ashby's men—men from Hampton's Legion—Imboden's Virginians—Rosser's Rangers—guerrillas from Mosby's command. There were fragments from every cavalry command we had met on the turnpikes of old Virginia, and there wasn't a squadron that would stand for a charge. The battery began firing more rapidly, and there wasn't a man of us who did not realize what was coming long before we got the word. Some of the horses knew it, too. You could feel them filling their lungs and stringing up their nerves for hard work.

The troops in gray wheeled into line under a fire which must have tried the nerves of the bravest, and then the compact mass got the word to advance. They were coming for our battery, which was without infantry supports. There we stood, two thin, short lines, representing one thousand dragoons, but not numbering half that figure, and a body of five to one was moving down. They saw the odds and wondered, perhaps, why we did not run away.

"Attention!"

We had obeyed the order before it was given.

"Right dress!"

We were a minute ahead of the command.

"Forward—draw sabres—guide right—trot!"

Ah! We are off! The gray moves north and the blue moves south. We are going to meet in the meadow below. We must hold them back until infantry support can be brought up. Every man knows he is moving down into a maelstorm of death, but no one lags. A strange exultation creeps into the heart. It is as if you had heard some grand, good news and wanted to shout over it and tell everybody of your good luck.

"Gallop—charge!"

[illegible] Who, if one could die a score of times instead of only once, there would be no fear. I sit so lightly in the saddle that my horse seems to have no weight to carry. He skims over the ground as if he had wings, and I begin cheering and yelling in chorus with my comrades. It is a living missile of five hundred men thrown at the front of three thousand. What a crash there will be! How horses will go down and men pitch from their saddles! Afraid? No! Why, man, I would not miss the scene for a year's life! My hand clutches the sabre with a strength I did not know I possessed. I feel a hunger for blood such as I never felt before.

"Yi! Yi! Whoop—rah!" and we strike them fair in the center. The five hundred have the greatest momentum, and we drive through the three thousand as a wedge is pounded into soft wood. Men strike at me. There is a flash, flash and a pop, pop of pistols. I strike back. I feel the desire of the tiger to slay.

"Rally!"

We have driven through the mass and the bugles sound the call to gather for the return. The horses obey it without a touch of the rein. It seems that the whole living mass is riding in a circle and that there is blood on every man and horse. All at once we shoot out from under the smoke cloud into the sunshine—not the five hundred, but the three hundred—and the battery opens again. We are to the right of it, and it sends grape shots into a wild mob to drive it back into the cover of the woods. It is a sight to look down over that field. Five hundred dead and wounded men and horses are lying there. It is only as I sit on my horse and look over the field that I feel weak and grow frightened. My head begins to swim—things grow dark, and some one helps me to the ground. I have a pistol ball in my shoulder and the blood is running down my back from a sabre cut on the head.—Detroit Free Press.

His Revenge.

The girl that I love has gone back on me quite,
It is hard thus my hopes should
miscarry;
But I am told in a note which came to me last night,
That another man she is to marry.

Ruddy haired was my love, and I thought I could trust
One with locks which should make her warm hearted;
But she's made her decree, and accept it I must—
I have tried to be brave since we parted.

And though to my happiness this is the end,
Through my hopes and my fancies are dead ones,
A flower piece superb to her wedding I'll send—
A horse in white roses on red ones.

A LITTLE SKETCH FROM LIFE.

BY MARION W. O BROWN.

"I guess I won't go to church this morning, Silas," said Mrs. Peters, while sitting at the breakfast table one lovely Sabbath in June.

"Why Mandy! I thought you wanted to hear the sermon; you know Elder Bishop is going to preach to-day."

"I know all about that," replied Mrs. Peters, with a sigh; "but it's nine o'clock now, and with all I have to do I can't possibly get ready to start by half past ten."

"Let me help you, Mandy. I can wash dishes; yes and sweep too," he added, triumphantly.

"Yes, and probably you can make all the beds and get the children ready for Sunday-school, and clean off the stove and skim the milk and wash the pans and peel the potatoes for dinner and get the meat cut and in the spider and lay the fire ready to light when we get home," replied Mrs. Peters, scornfully.

"Now, Mandy," said he by this time crestfallen Mrs. Peters. "I [illegible] all right; can't you let the [illegible]ng and cleaning the stove [illegible] time! and we can do with[out the pot]atoes for once. It will make [a chan]ge," he added dryly.

[Cha]nge! Yes, I guess so. If [you wa]nt a change so bad you had [better] go and board with Mrs. Rus[sell]. You'll get a change there I [guess]," and she smiled grimly. [Why], when I went over there the [other] morning to borrow a little [soda t]hey had just finished break[fast, a]nd such a breakfast!"

[W]hy, what was it, Mandy?" [asked] Silas, with his curiosity [arouse]d.

"What was it? You had better say what wasn't it. That was just exactly it. There wasn't a single bit of pie on that table, nor pickles, nor cheese, nor jelly, nor anything—much."

"Well, they had something to eat didn't they?" queried Mr. Peters.

"Yes, they had bread and butter and mashed potatoes and steak, oatmeal and cream, and coffee and cookies," with a sniff of scorn; "but not even one smitch of pie."

"Well, she's a good cook anyway for I've eat there," said Silas, decidedly. "And I don't see but what they had as good a meal as we've got, Mandy."

"Humph! Guess you better board there a while, Silas Peters." And Mrs. Peters rose from the breakfast table.

"Anyway," said Silas to himself as he was harnessing his horses for church, "I'd rather eat just bread and milk for dinner if Mandy would only go with me once in a while. Yes, and for breakfast and supper too," he added heroically. "There goes Tom Russell now with his wife and baby. How happy he looks, and well he may, for he's got his wife; she goes' most everywhere with him. I do wish Mandy would go with me. It seems kinder lonesome," he mused, getting into the buggy with his two furbelowed children and chirping to the old horse.

In regard to this conversation, it may be well to say that the women of the little hamlet of Ashville had followed strictly in their forefathers' (or foremothers', rather) footsteps—tables crowded with everything set on promiscuously—pickles, cheese and pie for breakfast, pie cheese and pickles for dinner, and cheese, pickles and pie for supper. And at each "society" or tea party that was held each lady tried to outdo the one before her. If Mrs. A had three kinds of cake and two of pie, Mrs. B. would have four or five of cake and three of pie, with perhaps tarts as an addition; while Mrs. C. would by no means diminish the quanity of pie and cake, but would also add dried beef, jelly, cheese etc.

Elder Bishop's sermon that morning was excellent; so thought every one with perhaps the exception of Silas Peters. He sat in his pew with his two children, but his eyes kept wandering to the Russell's pew.

"She's most as old as Mandy," mused he. "Mandy's a little past thirty and Mrs. Russell, so Jim Snyder's wife said, is twenty-eight She don't look worried; no wrinkles nor lines.

Poor Mandy! maybe I haven't helped her as much as I might. Mrs. Russell looks so happy and contented. Wonder if she had as much to do as Mandy this morning?" as a sudden thought struck him.

After service he returned home to find a clean house, beautifully shining stove and a delicious dinner; but a worried and irritable wife.

"It's been so warm," she said. "It tired me all out cleaning up. I haven't sat down a minute since you've been gone;" with the air of a martyr who faces duty at whatever cost.

"Mandy, why don't you let something go once in a while and rest a little? This dirt fight will wear you out."

"Rest! Me! With all this work! Leave some? Cleanliness is next to godliness, Silas Peters."

"Yes, Mandy, next to godliness. The godliness comes first, dear," hesitatingly.

Mandy looked quickly up, a pink flush on her face; when had he called her so before? Not since their old sweet courting days. It touched a tender spot in her heart, and after the dinner work was done up, as Silas sat thoughtfully on the porch in the shade, she said softly:

"Silas, wouldn't you like to take me to church to-night as you used to?"

He looked up quickly.

"Like to? Why Mandy, you know I've wanted to for ever so long, but you are always so busy or tired. Will you go, Mandy?" with an eager light in his eyes.

"If you will take me," she said, half smiling.

He looked at her a moment and then said abruptly:

"How pretty you look, Mandy; why, what makes your cheeks so pink? You look almost as you used to eight years ago." Then, with a sudden daring look in his eyes: "Have you heard how Tom Russell uses his wife?"

"Why no, Silas Peters; he's kind to her, I know he is. You needn't tell me any bad stories about Tom Russell. I know better. But what did you hear? How does he use her?"

"This way," answered Silas; and suddenly rising and going to where his wife was leaning against the lattice work he slipped his arm around her slender waist, while with his other hand he tipped her face up to his and softly kissed her lips.

"Why, Silas!" and she burst into a passion of tears upon his shoulder.

"Mandy, I know I haven't been very kind to you of late years. I've been thinking all the time of getting my work done and making money, and I guess, Mandy, maybe it's a good deal my fault that you don't go more, and are getting so worn and tired; but, please God, dear, I will try and do better," holding her close to him.

"Silas, forgive me!"

"For what, dear?"

"Being so cross to you."

"It's all right, dear. I don't blame you; being so tired and worried it was natural. But we will try and do better, won't we, little woman?"

And standing there that lovely afternoon, her head on his breast and his arms around her, they seemed nearer and dearer to each other than they had in many long years.

Mandy is not the only woman who carries this dirt-fight to an extreme. But, as dear Samantha Allen says, "Do be mejum." If it cannot be both—and with many, especially those with children to care for, it cannot be—which shall it be? The "mejum" course, making the home a true home, the best and dearest place on earth to husband and children; a home which will always be remembered in connection with mother, love and sympathy, the dear home refuge from the outside world? or a home remembered in connection with spotless floors, shining stoves, duster, mop and scrubbing brush?

"Keep Mam" Out of Jail.

An incident occurred recently in one of the police courts of Chicago, in which a little street boy's devotion to his drunken mother was touchingly shown.

A woman had been picked up in a state of intoxication and carried to a police station, where she spent the night. The next morning she was arranged before the magistrate. Clinging to her tattered gown were two children, a boy and a girl, the former only seven years of age, but made prematurely old by the hardships of his wretched life.

"Five dollars and costs," said the judge, sternly; "seven dollars and sixty cents in all."

Instantly the little fellow started up, and taking his sister's arm, he said: "Come on we've got to get that money or mam'll hev to go to jail. Jest wait Mr. Jedge, and we'll git it!"

The children hurried out, and going from store to store, solicited subscriptions to "keep mam from going to jail," the boy bravely promising the giver to return the money as soon as he could earn it. Soon he came running back into the court room, and laying a handful of small change on the magistrate's desk, exclaimed:

"There's two dollars, Mr. Jedge, and I can't git no more now. I ain't as big as mam, and I can't do as much work; but if you'll jist le me go to jail, 'stead o' her, I'll stay longer to make up for it."

The bystanders wiped their eyes, and a policeman exclaimed, "Your mother shant go to jail my lad, if I have to pay the fine myself."

"I will remit the fine," said the judge; and the woman clasping her boy in her arms, sank upon her knees solemnly vowed that she would lead a better life and try to be worthy of such a son as that.

"Indeed! He was one of the sprightliest fellows I ever met, always bubbling over with spirits and chock full of stories. He's away from home, I suppose; I haven't seen him since I returned."

"He's at home; he has never been away."

"Indeed! where is he then?"

"He's in the kitchen washing dishes."

WASHINGTON LETTER

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4th.—Mr. Harrison has been appealed to by his party associates to use his influence to stop the big row which the new tariff bill has created among the republicans in the House. Mr. Harrison will find it a big contract should he decide to undertake it. The Massachusetts members accuse chairman McKinley of breaking up his pledged word to them, and say that no bill which puts a duty upon hides (this one does now) shall ever pass the House with their consent. There are a number of republican members from other sections who are mad because their constituents were not given free carpet wools, and other raw materials and to these may be added the sugar and tobacco crowd who do not like the bill. The republican leaders are very uneasy over the outlook and fear to call a caucus on this bill until they can stop some of the protests, and an effort will be made, now that the bill is before the full committee, to make some changes in it. If they are not successful the bill is likely to be openly opposed by enough republicans to insure its defeat.

The bill for the admission of Idaho has been railroaded through the House.

The spasm of industry which caused the Senate to pass a resolution making 11 o'clock the hour of meeting passed off as it came on and the old hour will be resumed on Monday.

Contrary to general expectation, the Senate Judiciary committee has reported a substitute for Senator Sherman's trust bill. It is substancially the original bill stripped of the amendments. House committee on the Judiciary is also making a great pretence of being engaged in considering anti-trust bill. Notwithstanding all this I think the trusts are safe so long as the republicans control Congress.

Mr. Quay had to ply the party whip very vigorously before he got those Florida nominations confirmed, but he whipped the kickers in at last and his orders were obeyed, and yet there are republicans who deny that Mr. Quay is the autocrat of the Senate.

The dependent pension bill has passed the Senate, and the debate upon it makes it certain that quite a number of republicans are opposed to any other pension legislation at present. There is a plot in the House to add the Morrill service pension bill to this measure as an amendment, and if it succeeds there it may afterwards get through the Senate.

The Montana contested election cases were taken up in the Senate this week, and a vote is expected today or tomorrow. It has also leaked out why the matter has dragged so slowly along. Senator Evarts and one or two other republicans have so far refused to vote to seat the republicans, believing that the matter should be referred back to the people.

Absenteeism on the part of the Chiefs of divisions and bureaus in the Interior department has become such an abuse that Secretary Noble has issued an order that no chief or other clerk shall absent in future without obtaining permission.

Hamilton Shidy, the man who was given a position in the Census office as a reward for testifying against the postmaster at Milwaukee, by whom he was employed, has been removed from office, but the Civil Service Commissioners for whom Shidy did the dirty work, and who got him the office he has been dismissed from, are still in office.

The Senate Committee seems in no hurry to report the World's Fair bill, and will probably not do so before next week.

The members of the Pan American Congress will start on their southern excursion in about two weeks. On the 11th inst. Secretary Proctor has ordered a review of all the regular army troops stationed here and of the local militia for the pleasure of the foreigners. On the evening of the same day the Congress will entertain Mr. Harrison at dinner.

Two appropriation bills—the army, and the fortification, have been passed by the House.

The National association of democratic clubs has established headquarters in this city, and will take a very active part in the coming Congressional campaign.

The members of the House who lost their salaries through Silcott's defalcation were made to feel good by a decision of the court of claims this week that the Government was responsible for the stolen money. The case will be appealed.

The friends of the Windom silver bill will try to have that measure called up for consideration by the House on the 15th inst.

Senator Edmunds and Ingalls have not spoken to each other outside of the Senate chamber for quite a long while.

The Roanoke Machine Works has 1,200 employes on its pay roll.

AMOS COWHOOF.

A Sad Accident.

On last Wednesday the 2nd inst., the boiler of Jas. Gibson's steam saw mill bursted, causing the death of Wm. Jack, aged about 16 years, and son of W. O. Jack, of Elk. The accident occurred about 2 o'clock, and the young man died the next morning the 3rd about 9 o'clock. He was blown several feet away from the engine, and literally boiled alive; there being "but a small patch on his breast of flesh that did not peel off, he suffered fearfully he was buried on Friday on his father's farm.

Sad ending of a life just beginning, but unforseen and hence unavoidable.

A few minutes before the explosion a leak of steam was noticed by Mr. Robertson the sawyer, in the corner of the boiler, he went to it with a hammer and cold chisel and closed the leak to some extent and went back to the saw; by the time he run three or four lines the explosion occurred—thus showing how near a man can come to eternity, and yet stay on the shores of time.

Mr. Gleady, the fireman had a dream the night before in which he thought that his engine blew up and killed him, and did not care much about going to work that morning, but the hands laughed at his fears and premonition, and he went to work. So it did blow up, and he was not killed, but one was. So much for the warning of impending evil.

Mr. Gleady at the time of the explosion was filling the fire box with wood. The break was on the back end of the boiler, as far from him as it could be; he was knocked down and rolled over, but fortunately was not scalded, being under and out of the line of the escaping steam.

He had just told the young man who was killed who was standing near the boiler at the leaking place, to go away as it was dangerous there, and he supposed he had just started off, when the steam struck him, as his coat was turned over his head when found near the saw.

Mr. Gibson's children had just left the engine and gone a few rods toward home, they only escaped death by about 3 to 5 minutes.

XX.

TWO DISTRESSING ACCIDENTS.—On Wednesday, March 26th in the neighborhood of Bald Eagle, Va., about 12 miles above Lynchburg, Mr. Robert Campbell was burning brush on his farm on the Amherst side, his little nine year old daughter being with him. The little girl was standing near one of the fires when her dress caught in a blaze and she was so badly burned that she died from her injuries in a short time.

Mr. Thomas Haight and wife, living on the opposite side of the river, learned of the accident, and decided to go over and spend the night with their afflicted neighbors. They started about dusk to cross the river in a small boat. Through some mishap the boat was capsized, and the husband and wife were both drowned while on their mission of love. Eight children are left orphans by this double calamity, and the sympathies of the neighborhood are stirred to the depths.

A HERO OF THE LAKES.—A pathetic story of disaster, of lingering horror and of supreme heroism comes to us from the great lakes. At this season of the year they are lined with broken ice and swept by fierce gales. Venturesome fishermen, nevertheless, try their skill amid the perils of wind and waves. On the edge of the ice pack on the shore of Lake Erie an upturned, waterlogged and rapidly sinking boat bearing a half frozen, half starved man was picked up the other day. He had been in the ice and water for days, and was so nearly dead that his recovery will be attended by the loss of some of his frozen limbs. When he set out on the treacherous water he had a companion. Their boat was overturned, and they clambered on her bottom. For hours they hung there, hoping for rescue. Then they discovered their joint weight was too great for the water logged boat. If both remained by her both would die by drowning when she went down. One might stand a chance of being saved. The other man coolly and calmly looked the situation in the face. "I have no relatives dependent on me, no one to mourn for me," he said at last, "while you have a mother and sister who look to you for support. Goodbye, old fellow. I'm going to meet my creator." Then with a silent prayer he slid into the chill waters and disappeared forever. That was heroism of the highest tpye—the heroism of the highest type—heroism of sacrifice.—Press.

A dispatch from Washington to the New York Star says: There are well sustained rumors that Bridget Sweeney, the trusted old servant who had been living in Secretary Tracy's family for fourteen years or more, has confessed that she fired the house, at which his wife and daughter were burned to death in Washington, with kerosene, and that after starting the fire she went to church. No motive whatever is assigned for the horrible deed, and no possible incentive except insanity.

The treaty between the United States and Canada has been approved and published by the Queen and went into effect April 4. After this the boodlers will have to seek seek some other retreat for safety.

A shower of fish from an inch to three inches in length fell at Lebanon, Tenn., March 25, from a pear shaped cloud that was rapidly propelled by a strong current at an immense height. An examination of the fish proved that they were of a kind only found in the waters of China and Thibet.

Two fools well matched are Douglass Green, the New York banker, and Mrs. Snell McCrea, daughter of the murdered millionaire Snell, of Chicago, who were married by a negro preacher at Old Point Comfort and fled to London, but they do not seem to know it, as each is sick of the other and both want to come home and hide their diminished heads.

How Convicts Get Pardoned.

Henry Southgate was one of the men engaged in robbing the Indiana National Bank some years ago in what was known as the "orange box robbery," the box being used to stand upon while the thief reached over the glass framework upon the counter and lifted out several thousand dollars in bank notes—it was, I think, $20,000 or $25,000.

Southgate's friends pressed an application for pardon on the ground that he was dying of consumption. Governor Hendricks believed the story and pardoned him. "In a very short time after his release Southgate was as lively and healthy an evil doer as there was in the State," said a prison official. "He had simply been playing the soap trick."

"What's that?"

"Eating soap. The effect was to bleach his skin by producing a dearth of blood, or rather by changing the corpuscles, increasing the white and diminishing the red. There are no serious consequences following the use of soap, and when discontinued the man rapidly gets well.

"Governor Hendricks, naturally enough, was much chagrined over the deception, and made an entry in his office to the effect that it was never safe to pardon a man merely because he looked sick. Men in prison will do other things to excite sympathy and make it appear that they are dying of consumption."

"Now and then a fellow will strike himself in the throat, or even cut himself within the throat or under the tongue. Then he will spit blood in the presence of the physician, walk feebly, and talk in a whisper. Sometimes they eat dirt, which stops digestion, and this is followed by a falling off in flesh.

"A short time ago a request was made for the pardon of a notorious criminal, on the ground that he was dying. He was, upon that showing placed in the hospital, from which he escaped, but was captured four days later."

"You can't teach an ol[illegible] new tricks," said old Judge D[illegible], of Yellow Mound City, when [illegible] wife begged him for the third [illegible] to remember to eat with his f[illegible] at her approaching dinner party. "I'll try not to forget, my dear, [illegible] I wasn't brought up to it, [illegible] folks ought to do what they are brought up to."

He did not remember at the dinner party. His knife went [illegible] his mouth a dozen times. Next day, when the family was dining [illegible], the old judge detected his [illegible] est son, Frank, with his knife [illegible] his lips.

"Eating with your knife, [illegible] Leave the table!" thundered the old judge. "You'll eat [illegible] and milk till further orders."

"Really, papa, I think [illegible] too hard on poor Frankie," said Mrs. Dewey, as the little fellow left the table. "The boys of [illegible] older boys and the grown up daughters showed that they agreed with their mother.

"He ate with his knife growled the old man.

"So did you at the dinner," retorted Mrs. Dewey, severely.

"Don't I know it returned the judge. Don't I know it! I eat with my knife because I was brought up to it, but that boy wasn't brought up to it. None of my children was brought up to it, and if I catch one of 'em doing it, as sure as I live, I'll lock 'em up on spoon victuals till they learn the use of a fork!"

There has not been a death among the white population of Elbert County, Ga., in two years.

"Remarkable how wet it is!"

"Wouldn't it be more remarkable if it was dry, in this rain?"

A young lady had been sworn in court in Philadelphia, and had begun her testimony, when a typical juror objected because she had not kissed the Bible, which led Judge Arnold to say that he would not have kissed a book as greasy and dirty from handling as that was, either and that the kissing ought to be abolished as a relic of idolatry.

Mr. Newwed (with suppressed emotion)—The last time I went to the club and came home late I found you asleep, and in your sleep you murmured "Come to-morrow night as usual, my darling; my husband will be away." Now, madam, I have stayed at home every night since, but I have been unable to identify my rival, and I demand an explanation.

POLLY'S GHOST.

Pretty Polly Paschall sat bolt upright, her red-brown curls falling in rich confusion about her throat, her brown eyes as wide as if she had not been in bed and asleep for hours. The lamp was turned low, as she had left it, and shown with a dim, soft radiance over all the richly furnished room.

Polly stared about her. The chairs, the tables, the little quaintly carved stand by the window which held her precious pilgrim bottle, were all just as she had left them! Suddenly, her eyes fell upon the little square in the wall high above book-case.

"My ghost at last!" said Polly, clasping her palms together. She waited a moment in breathless silence, but hearing no repetition of the noise which had awakened her she sprang out of bed, put on her slippers and dressing gown, threw some bits of wood upon the still glowing embers, and, turning out the lamp, she sat down before the fire to await the ghost whose coming she had been expecting for lo! these many days.

The Paschalls, father, mother and daughter, had moved into their present abode to await the erection of their own house, and upon the very first day of their coming Polly had spied the little "secret door" as she called it, and selected this for her room.

"Just think of the possibilities for a romance!" she said to her father; and he had gotten upon the house cleaner's step ladder and found the door fastened hard and fast.

"It is all safe," he said.

"Oh, I want it to be safe from mortal hands," Polly said [illegible]

Though the rain pattered soothingly upon the windows, and the warmth and glow within were conducive to day dreaming, Polly soon found the hours of idleness growing tedious.

"I shall try again," she said, at last, "to see if I can open the little door door which I am sure leads to my ghost."

Polly was light and graceful and agile, so to scramble from the back of the big chair to the top of the bookcase was but the work of a moment. The little door, which was sunken in the wall above, was of black oak, richly carved. Polly searched it closely to see if she could find any possible way to open it. Suddenly, almost by chance, her fingers touched a little spot in the eye of one of the carved griffins, a spring clicked, and the door flew open in her face.

Polly gave a scream, and sank down upon the top of the bookcase. She waited a moment; no sign, no sound resulted from her successful effort, and she stood up and peered through the doorway. Gradually, as her eyes became accustomed to the semi darkness, she began to distinguish the objects in the little room beyond. There was a case of books, a large square table, and one chair, big and cozy and comfortable looking.

Polly's father had always called her a plucky girl, and now she hesitated only a moment, then stepped up through the opening into the room beyond.

It was a very small room she found when she had gotten in, and the only door that led from it was locked. The books on the shelves were old and rusty looking.

"They belong to a dead generation," said Polly.

[illegible] the tables were papers, sheet [illegible] sheet of manuscript, pencils, and ink. The chair was sit[illegible] before the table as if some one [illegible] been writing, and upon the [illegible] were fresh embers.

"[illegible] ghost is certainly a sensible [illegible] creature—humanly so," said Polly, [illegible] seated herself in the chair, [illegible] began to look over the papers [illegible] table.

[illegible] there were many notes and [illegible], meaningless and disjointed, [illegible] finally she came to a packet [illegible] containing quite a long manuscript, [illegible] written, much folded and [illegible].

"[illegible] ghost is an author," said [illegible] his manuscript has been [illegible] proved unavailable for [illegible]. Poor fellow! Well, [illegible] read his story. The plot [illegible]. Think of being able to [illegible] ghost's story!"

[illegible] began to read, turning the [illegible] slowly at first, but gradually [illegible] page flew over the closely [illegible] meagery the words and [illegible] were filling her with an [illegible] she had seldom felt.

"[illegible] the woman had not been [illegible]," she said; "if she had [illegible] such stiff, silly things, one [illegible] feel that the story was perfect."

She sat a moment in deep thought. "[illegible] before I can do it; at all events I shall try; but not now." She got up, arranged the papers and chair just as she had found them, and crept down through the little door into her own room.

The next day, Miss Paschall surprised the [illegible] by ordering a whole [illegible] of "[illegible]."

Richard Blount opened the door of his bare little study, put down the armful of wood he was carrying and knelt down upon the hearth to kindle a fire. He was what a casual observer would call an ugly man, but he had a good, well-knit figure, a fine head, and strong though irregular features.

There was a tired, troubled look on his face, as he sat down to his writing table and bent his head upon his folded hands. He was weary in mind and body. His days had been always days of toil; his life had been one long struggle. With the heritage of a good name that had come to him from his forefathers, there had come from his father a legacy of debt which he had been striving for years to pay.

"My task is almost done," he said to himself. "If I could only get my story accepted! If I only knew how to make it go! I feel sure there are good things in it; but if I only knew what to make the girl say! When a fellow's acquaintance with women doesn't extend beyond a knowledge of his own grandmother, he can't have a very clear idea of what a young girl's conversation would be like. Well, I'll try once more and see what I can do with it."

He picked up the MS., which was folded carefully, and still in the place where he had left it.

Slowly he turned over the first few pages, listlessly reading them.

Suddenly he held the paper up close to the lamp. The handwriting had changed! There was no break in the story, but as he read on he found whole pages which he had not written, and gradually it dawned upon him that these additions were giving his story a life, a spark that it had not had before.

"Who can have done it?" he said, when he had finished. "No one knows of this den but myself—not even grandmother. Perhaps it is a ghost come back from out our past grandeur," he said, with a smile, "and a very witty ghost she is, too," looking at the beautiful womanly writing that was mingled with his own. "I feel deeply indebted to her for her interference. Well, I shall send the story off again, and, if it is published, that will make my assistant show up, if she be not a ghost in very truth," he said, by and by.

"I have brought you the magazine containing the new story that is creating such a furor just now," said Polly's father to her one day. "Nobody knows the author, but I am told he has made the hit of the season."

"Oh," said Polly, significantly, when she had cut the leaves. That was all. She went up to her room, taking the magazine.

"I believe I shall pay another visit to my ghost's apartment, she said, when she had finished reading the story.

So saying, she scrambled up on the bookcase, opened the door and went into the room beyond. Her dress caught on the door as she passed through and pulled it to with a click. Before she had time to extricate herself, she heard a key inserted into the lock on the other side of the room, the door opened and a man walked in. Polly leaned back against the wall frightened.

The young man stood holding the door in his hand, with a startled expression in his big, gray eyes.

"How on earth did you get here?" he asked, abruptly.

"Through the little door here," said Polly, [illegible]. "It has shut [illegible] behind me. Oh, dear, I thought you were a ghost!"

"No, I think it is you who are the ghost," said the young man, with a smile.

"Won't you open the door for me?" said Polly, recovering herself.

The young man came up to her.

"You are Miss Paschall," he said. "I have heard my grandmother speak of you. My name is Richard Blount."

Polly turned her beautiful eyes a moment up to his good, ugly face, and held out her hand to him. He blushed as he took it, and for a moment neither spoke.

"I fear I can not open this little 'trap' door for you from this side," he said at last. "There is a long hall which leads over your house to the one grandmother and I occupy now. Come, I will take you out that way. I come all the way over here so that my light may not disturb grandmother at night. If your own apartments are near this, I fear I have disturbed you," he added, as he held the door open and she passed out into the narrow hallway.

"O, no," she answered, "I think I have only heard you once, and then I was in hopes you were a ghost."

"So you were caught by the little spring lock," said old Mrs. Blount, when they had found her and Polly's presence was explained. "I remember being fastened in the little square room once. It was when I was a young girl, and here on a visit to your Aunt Ellen, Richard. Your grandfather induced me to climb through the little door, and then he fastened it behind me. He called to me that he would not let me out until I had promised to marry him. But come, we will take Miss Paschall through the little side door of the library and she will be at home in a moment," said the old lady.

"There was a time when I was in hopes you were a ghost, too," Richard said to Polly, as he held the door open for Polly to pass through.

"Why?" asked the girl.

"So that I might hope for farther assistance in writing my stories," he answered, with a smile.

Not many months had passed, however, before he was telling her he could not write without her—that he could not live without her.

"Well, I suppose I must make the sacrifice and marry you Richard, dear," Polly answered, "if for nothing but to preserve you from manufacturing such heroines as your first was before I redeemed her."

She was from Boston; he from St. Joseph.

"You have traveled a great deal in the West, have you not, Miss Beacon?"

Oh, yes, indeed. In California and Arizona, and even New Mexico."

"Have you ever seen the Cherokee strip?"

There was a painful silence, but finally she looked over her glasses at him and said:

"In the first place, sir, I deem your question extremely rude; and in the second place, you might have been more refined in your language by asking me if I had ever seen the Cherokee disrobe."

The [illegible] of the hotel was in the parlor warbling, "Oh, would I were a bird."

"Well, here's a beginning for you," said the landlord. And he handed him his bill.

"That is not more than half the composition," she said, as she turned on the piano stool. "Shall I play the rest?"

"Yes," he replied, abstractedly, "play the rest by all means; play all the rests you can find."

The Iowa Legislature passed the Australian ballot reform bill.

The Washington Presbytery has decided by a vote that they don't want any change in the confession of faith.

Governor Jackson, of Maryland, signed the Australian ballot bill. The new law will be operative in Baltimore and many of the counties.

William Falloway, who ran the first locomotive on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, died suddenly in Baltimore. He was the oldest railroad engineer in the world and was born in 1809.

A syndicate, of which it is said President M. E. Ingalls, of the Chesapeake and Ohio, is a member, has purchased property near Charleston, and will lay it off in town lots. The price paid was $200,000, and it is said that an iron furnace will be erected there at once.

A trust deed has just been recorded by Ted Hotchkiss, of Staunton, Va., for $450,000, purchase money on a 400,000 acre tract of land in Lincoln and Wayne Counties. The deal is the largest in wild lands ever recorded in West Virginia.

A young mail carrier named Gustavus Wilmouth is under arrest in Roane County for a peculiar series of crimes. Wilmouth forged the name of Benjamin Rodgers, a wealthy farmer, to a number of notes and collected the money. He then systematically broke open the mails and destroyed the notes when they were sent back to Rodgers. Wilmouth has confessed.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the surrender of Lee to General Grant at Appomattox, was celebrated at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on the 10th inst., by the Twenty-third Regiment, who tendered a reception to General Wm. Tecumseh Sherman, General G. O. Howard and General Henry Slocum. There were no speeches.

Two young shoemakers of the New Hampshire village of Northwood could not find any whiskey there, and, as a substitute for it, bought a quart of Jamaica ginger at a drug store. One of them was dead two hours after, and the other came near it.

BARN BURNED.—On Thursday night last, the barn of Miss Katie Mott, between Lewisburg and Ronceverte, was burned. The fire was discovered about midnight, but too late to save anything—not even the stock that was quartered therein. She lost besides the barn, three fine horses, a carriage, a buggy, harness and other property. Her loss will aggregate from $1,200 to $2,000. No insurance. The origin of the fire is shrouded in mystery. —Independent.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 14th. —Ex-Speaker Samuel J. Randall, who has for many years occupied a conspicuous place in the front rank of the fighting democracy of Congress, has probably made his last appearance upon the political stage. He has been confined to his house ever since Congress met and this week his case has become almost hopeless and his death is regarded by his physicians as only a question of days, perhaps hours. It is very touching to see, as your correspondent did, two of his democratic colleagues in the House standing talking of his condition with the tears trickling down their cheeks.

Ex Speaker Carlisle has prepared the minority report on the McKinley tariff bill, and it is a very strong and full statement of the position of the democratic party on the tariff. It has about been decided that the democrats of the House will not prepare a tariff bill of their own, but will offer such amendments to the McKinley bill as there may seem a probability of passing with the aid of republican votes, provided that the republicans make a serious attempt to pass their bill which at this time seems somewhat doubtful.

The Senate has completed the absurd farce by passing the alleged bill against trusts which was reported from the Judiciary committee last week as a substitute for the Sherman bill, which was itself a fraud as far as placing any real restrictions upon the operations of the trusts was concerned. Of course the people know better than to expect any relief from a Senate largely composed of millionaires who have made their money by trusts or similar monopolies. The Senate is too far from the people to have a fellow feeling for them.

The members of the House whose salaries were carried off by Silcott are happy. The Secretary of the Treasury having decided not to appeal from the decision of the Court of Claims that the Government was responsible, a bill appropriating $75,000 to make good the stolen money has passed both Houses and Senate.

The Montana contested election case is still being debated as "unfinished business" between times by the time boss Quay brings out his whip they will obey him as usual.

The republicans of the House made a sly attempt this week to railroad a modified pension bill, involving an estimated expenditure of $30,000,000 a year, through under a suspension of the rules, but fortunately for the tax payers of the country the necessary two-thirds vote was not secured, though they came very near it.

Still another useless office is proposed. The republicans, encouraged by their success in getting Congress to create assistant secretaries of the Navy and War departments, have introduced a bill for still another assistant secretary of the Navy at a salary of $4,500 a year, and this too in the face of the fact that one can hardly turn around in Washington without coming in contact with Naval officers drawing salaries for doing nothing, who might just as well perform the duties of assistant to the Secretary of the Navy.

The republicans are now trying to tickle the silver people by giving it out that a special committee of the Senate is preparing a bill that is to be more favorable to silver than any of the measures before Congress.

The lot of the civil service commission is certainly not a happy one. An attempt is to be made in the House to defeat its appropriation. This would be a cruel way to kill the law, but many people think it would be justifiable.

Mr. Blaine's proposition to amend the McKinley tariff bill so as to make it inoperative in the cases of such American countries as will reciprocate is not enthusiastically received by the republicans in Congress. They say that the proper way to bring about free trade, if it is desired with those countries, is to negotiate separate reciprocity treaties with each and submit them to the Senate for ratification. Perhaps Mr. Blaine remembers the treatment the Senate gave, not so long ago, to a reciprocity treaty with Mexico. Several reciprocating treaties are believed to have already been negotiated by Mr. Blaine with Central and South American countries.

The members of the Pan American Congress leave here on the 18th inst. for a tour of the South. They will return May 10.

BESSIE IN THE BLIZZARD.

BY KATE M. CLEARY.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Bessie, "how dreary it all looks!"

And indeed the view seen from the window of the big, white Western farm-house was anything but cheerful. Bare, brown, treeless prairie all around a sullen, wintry sky overhead, and not a living creature in sight, except a distant speck of scarlet down in the "draw"—Baby Willie at play.

Indoors it was pleasant enough. Bessie was a brisk and tiny little housekeeper. When, immediately after dinner, her father had brought round the team and he and her mother had driven off to town to do their regular weekly shopping, or "trading," as they called it, Bessie had bustled about at wonderful rate. She had washed the dishes, and put them in a shining row on the pine dresser; she had swept the room, she had polished the stove, and brought in water; and straightened the rocker cushions; she had set "sponge for the bread that was to be worked at night, and baked early in the morning; she had shaken the gay strip of rag carpet, and dusted the clock shelf, and ranged the chairs by the wall with mathematical precision. Then she had washed her face and hands in the bright tin pan kept for that purpose on a backless chair near the door and brushed and braided her soft brown hair. She took off her apron blue checked gingham, put on one of snowy nainsook, hung a clean roller towel on the rack, and put a kettle of water on the fire. Then she had taken up her one dear story book, and sat down to read.

It was a tremendously attractive book to the girl who had been brought up in the tameness and [illegible]

[illegible] rattling! and what a brisk tattoo the skeleton sunflower by the back door was playing on its panels!

But Baby Willie was enjoying himself. She could see him running up and down the "draw," dragging his little wagon after him.

She turned away. She sat in the big wooden rocker. She curled herself up like a comfort loving kitten. And rocking and thinking, somehow or other, she rocked and thought the cozy kitchen away. She didn't live in Nebraska, within five miles of the town of Bubble. She was not Bessie Linard at all. She was a brave woman in a frail boat, out on a stormy sea. She a helmeted heroine, leading hosts to battle. She was——

What a deafening noise! Was it the clang of a coming army? Was it the beat of drums, the clamor and clash of swords, the tread of marching feet!

No, not any of these. Only the creaking of the fan of the windmill, which was whirling at an astonishing rate. Only the noise of shaking windowframes. Only the clatter of milk pails piled outside the door.

Slam! Bang!

Bessie sprang from the rocker. Erect she stood, dazed, bewildered, still half asleep. A shutter had been blown violently against the window. Had a storm begun while she slept! She rushed to the casement, looked out—rather, she strove to look out. Ten feet beyond the pane she could see absolutely nothing. The whole world was white, wild, whirling.

"A snow storm!" gasped Bessie.

But it was no ordinary snow storm that had blown up. It was the terrific, the memorable blizzard of March 12, 1888.

Suddenly she cried out, such a [illegible], quivering cry:

"[illegible]! Baby Willie!"

[illegible] as a flash she flung a heavy [illegible] of her mother's over her, and unlatched the kitchen [door]. The furious wind tore it [from] her hold, and dashed it fierce[ly] back against the wall. Vainly [she] strove to close it behind her. [The] snow was driving in, swirling [over] the floor. She loosened the [illegible]. That the wind dashed [illegible] place just after she had made [her] frantic plunge into the storm.

[Never] such a storm! Bessie had lived [on] the prairie since she was a baby, [and] had seen the elements in their [wildest] moods and caprices. But she [had] never seen or imagined any [thing] like this. [illegible] sent her reeling. Her palms were cruelly lacerated by contact with the barbwire which formed the pasture fence. She knew now where she stood. About two yards to the left began the descent to the bluff, in the ravine of which she had last seen the child she sought. Her shawl wound itself around her body in a manner which impeded her progress as she stumbled on. She could feel she was going down the "draw;" feel, for sight was useless in such a storm.

[illegible]

The dear little lad! if she could only find him! She imagined him crouching down, trembling, sobbing, frightened; and growing stark and helpless with cold.

She tried to accelerate her speed—to rush down the incline. She tripped, fell; but she was up again in a second and battling on.

Down at last. Here, in the hollow between the prarie slopes, the blizzard raged less fiercely than above.

"Willie!" she called.

She could hardly hear her own voice.

"Willie!" she shrieked.

But the wind swept the word from her lips, and its sound was soft as a sigh.

If she could only see! She put up her hand and rubbed her eyes. The lashes were wet with freezing sleet. Her hair was one stiff, matted mass. Her feet ached with the sharp, biting cold. She tried to pray. "Dear God, Baby Willie! Oh, dear God, Baby Willie!" That was all she uttered.

All at once she stumbled over something—something scarlet in the snow. Eagerly she grasped it.

She dragged it up to her breast. She wrapped, as best her cold hands could, the shawl around it. Dead? Oh, no, no! She could feel the shivering pressure of the little limbs as she cuddled them to her.

Oh, for strength to reach home! Or would they both freeze, and die down here, and be buried in the snow!

A heavy burden for her slight arms, for her freezing hands, the sturdy baby she carried; a burden made still heavier by his present semi-stupor. She gripped her numb fingers around him. She bent her head. Beaten, swayed, buffeted, she made her way up the hill. She reached the level. She could not go much farther. Her hold of Willie was relaxing. He was slipping from her, or so she fancied. The bitter, bitter cold! her very heart was paining with it. Her whole slender, unprotected body was racked with its agony.

Was that the house? Directly before her something dark had loomed up. She tottered against it. A haystack. At its base she sank exhausted. One step farther would be simply a physical impossibility. Tighter she wrapped Willie in the shawl, and held him to her. Then, with her back against the haystack, her head bowed forward, her face hidden, she crouched there in lethargy, which drifted into drowsiness—drowsiness that was deadly as de[ath] [illegible]

———

"Willie!"

This was the first word she said, [illegible]

[illegible]

voice was [illegible] not dream[ed] [illegible]

"He is [illegible] well. [illegible] yet."

When she [illegible] derson was [illegible] and just behi[nd] [illegible] wee, rosy, rogu[ish] [illegible]

"You will be [illegible]" the doctor said, [illegible] der you lived. [illegible] ous when your father found [illegible] his return from town."

Just then her father came in. [He] said very little, but he stroked tenderly the thin hand on the gay calico counterpane.

"And—Willie?"

"He was not much the worse, thanks to you. You had him well protected. Come here, Willie."

He lifted the little chap on the bed. She smiled as she felt the clasp of the small, strong arms.

"Is it—snowing—still?"

The doctor laughed.

"Dear child, it is May," he said.

She looked bewildered.

"It was an awful blizzard," the doctor went on; "the worst ever known in the West. The papers were full of it. Many perished. Since the people were very brave and unselfish, and saved the lives of others. Their deeds, at least those that came to public knowledge, were praised all through the country. Yours was as grand as any. You are a heroine Bessie."

He was a young man a good-looking man. "A powerful smart doctor," averred the Western people among whom he had elected to practice. It had taken the exercise of all his skill to save Bessie Linard's life, and now he felt correspondingly elated.

"Oh no!" said Bessie very slowly and seriously; "I—thought no one could be a heroine in Nebraska."

"Gracious!" exclaimed Doctor Henderson, and he looked gravely at the wan sweet face on the pillow.

"Besides," she went on, meeting his glance with that quiet, direct, convincing gaze she had, and with just a flicker of rose-bloom coming into her cheeks, "heroines do something very wonderful, and I—I only did my best!"

That was two years ago. Bessie is eighteen now, and taller, healthier and prettier than ever. She and her mother are busy sewing; for this year there is to be a wedding in the old farm-house. When it is over Bessie Linard will not be Bessie Linard any more, but Mrs. Doctor Henderson. If they were fashionable people Willie would be pressed into service as a page. But as they are not anything of the sort, he will figure in the important ceremony merely as a boy, in a new corduroy suit and a silk necktie; a boy who possesses a fond pride in his sister and a tremendous appreciation of wedding cake.

ONE'S HOME ESTIMATE.

The general estimate of one in the community in which he lives is a convenient average test, but it is by no means conclusive, else why the embezzlers and defaulters and debauchers who have stood high, and by very virtue of public confi dence have been put in position to betray and plunder?

Opinion is not infallible. Nay, it is always open to scrutiny. Men are judged by superficial tests, by manners, church attendance, good looks, polite speeches, plausible compliances. The "The good fel low" has a well-known record. The "estimable citizen" may be found in Canada.

Still it would be hard to repudi ate the testimony of those with whom one lives, and as a rule the standing of a man in his own com munity must stand for much. It must hold good until a lapse of some kind proves its fallibility.

There will always be a few who look closer at men and study their [illegible] more searchingly than the [illegible] at large is in the habit of doing. The opinion of these [illegible] and cautious observers is [illegible]

WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 19th. —Secretary Blaine having sent for the United States minister to Bra zil has been holding long confer ences with him this week in order to concoct a plausible statement, which is to be made public, to ac count for the slowness on the part of this Government in recognizing the Republic of Brazil. He may make any statement he pleases but the fact will remain that the recog nition did not take place until the democrats in Congress had intro duced a resolution to compel its be ing done.

The tariff bill, which after many hitches and delays was finally re ported to the House late Wednes day afternoon, is not the measure it was when first made public by a good deal. The committee could not stand the pressures and were compelled to make many changes, among the most important of which were the placing of hides and su gar on the free list. To conciliate the sugar producers of this country a bounty of two cents a pound is provided for during the next fifteen years. Mr. Carlisle's minority re port shows that the bill will in strong terms punctures the hypocr isy of the whole bill; an additional minority report againt the sugar clause made by Mr. McKenna, a re publican. The majority report prac tically admits that the bill is a poor one, but excuses it on the ground of the necessity for "protection;" it admits also that the exact effect upon the revenues of the bill is "dif ficult of ascertainment," and very naively says: "It is not believed that the increase of duties upon wools and woolen goods and upon glass ware will have the effect of increasing the revenues." If the report told the entire truth it should have added that this increase in duties will add materially to the ex penses of every family in the Un ited States that purchases woolen goods of any kind or glassware. Further on the report says: "This bill is framed in the interest of the people of the United States." To have been truthful it should have read: "This bill is framed in the interest of certain manufacturers at the expense of the people of the Un ited States."

Thousands of people viewed the remains of the late Samuel Jackson Randall, as the body lay in state yesterday morning, previous to the funeral, in the Presby terian church which he and his family have at tended for years, and of which he became a member a few months ago. His colleagues of the House were anxious to have the funeral take place in the Hall of the House of Representatives, where Mr. Ran dall had gained his greatest tri umphs, but his widow refused to al low it because her distinguished husband had requested that he be given only the funeral of a private citizen. Immediately after the fun eral services the body was taken to his old home in Pennsylvania for in terment. Already there is a move ment started here by his old com rades of the Army of the Cumber land to erect a monument to his memory. He was a private in that army and should the statue be er ected it will be the first time that a private soldier has ever been so honored. Mr Randall lived and died a poor man, though he had opportunities to have made mil lions had he chosen to take advan tage of his official position as so many of our public men unfortun ately have done, but he has left a heritage far more valuable than money unimpeachable honesty, and a name that will forever shine in the pages of history among the brightest galaxy of the statesmen of his time.

The edict has gone out from Can [illegible] that legislation is to be rail roaded through the House from this time on, in order to adjourn by the first of July, and the republi cans began this [we]ek by passing the Naval appropriation bill, and the bill to reorganize the U. S. dis trict courts and appoint seventeen new judges. So outrageous was the haste to pass the latter that the democrats refused to vote, but the Speaker counted a quorum and an nounced the passage of the bill. The democrats are helpless now against these usurpations, but they will appeal to the people next No vember.

The republicans are still wrestl ing with the silver problem, and a joint committee of the House and Senate is trying to form a bill that will meet the approval of a caucus of their party.

The republicans of the U. S. Su preme Court have affirmed the de cision of the U. S. Circuit court which released Neagle, the U. S. deputy marshal who was arrested by the California authorities last summer for killing Judge Terry. Chief Justice Fuller and Justice La mar dessented; it was too great a stretch of Federal authority for them.

Death of Mr. Randall.

Hon. Samuel J. Randall, member of Congress from the third district of Pennsylvania and ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives, died at his residence in Washington at 5 o'clock on Sunday morning last, April 13th, 1890, aged 61 years. He was one of the ablest and purest of American statemen, an acknowledged leader of the Democratic party, and but for his fidelity to his tariff convictions which arrayed against him the masses of his party, he might have been President of the U. S. Mr. Randall's defence of the South in the years succeeding the war will always command for him the affection of her people.

Rowan county, Kentucky, the scene of the late murderous demonstrations of the moonshine distillers, lies in a mountainous region of that State and in the last Presidential election gave a majority for Harrison. In the campaign of 1888 the moonshiners were assured by the Republican orators and emissaries who were sent among them that in the event of Harrison's election the internal tax on whiskey would be repealed. Relying upon this promise, they gave a large vote to the Republican party and elected two Republicans to the present Congress. When the Republican Administration went into power they became more emboldened in their contraband pursuit, and now fiercely resist the revenue officers who are endeavoring to break it.—Ex.

TREAT OLD PEOPLE WELL.—There is nothing in the world more pathetic than the meek, timorous, shrinking ways of certain old people—we have all seen them—who have given up their old homes into younger hands, and subsided into some out-of-the way corner of it, to sit by the fireside and table henceforth as if afraid of "making trouble," afraid of being "in the way," afraid of accepting half that is their due, and going down to their graves with a pitiful, deprecating air as if constantly apologizing for staying so long. There is no scorn too deep and sharp for the sons and daughters who will accept this attitude on the part of those to whom they owe so much. Sometimes to be sure, people grow old with a bad grace. They become embittered by misfortune or affliction, or are peevish or unreasonable under the goad of ill-health. All the more they do appeal to great gentleness and faithfulness. Let it be borne in mind that we, too, are hastening on toward the sunset of life, and that we may ripen into very uncomfortable old people, to demand much more of patience and devotion than we as children, yield them—Christian Union.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that Contain Mercury.

as mercury will destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is 10 fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and it is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally and made in Toledo Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co.

The Postoffice Committee reports favorably the scheme to provide every town of a certain population a postoffice building, at the discretion of the Postmaster General. The bill appropriates $2,000,000 to begin on, there being about 2,000 towns which come within the scope of the measure.

Advice to Mothers.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used when children are cutting teeth. It relieves the little sufferer at once; it produces natural, quiet sleep, and the little cherub awakes as "bright as a button." It is very pleasant to taste. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, regulates the bowels, and is the best known remedy for diarrhoea, whether arising from teething or other causes. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

James Allen, one of the wealthy men of Starke County, O., who died the other day, at the age of 70, and was buried in accordance with his will, which was that no believer in "the contemptible and blasphemous doctrine of eternal punishment should be permitted to talk" at his funeral, no stone was to mark his grave, his wife was not to wear black, and the mourners were to have a big feast as soon as the funeral was over. Given a man with free thinking ways of an Ohio Yankee and the stubborn prejudices of ancient orthodoxy and you have a terror.

Enough of the Yankee.

A thrifty German, who owns a small farm out in Jefferson, has decided he will deal with his own people in the future. Not long ago a Connecticut man purchased a farm next to his, and one day he bought a sheep of his German neighbor, agreeing to pay him for it in 30 days. About two weeks later he called on the German and traded him the sheep for a hog.

At the end of the month the German went around after his money.

"Money for what?"

"Vy, for de sheep."

"Why, you've got your sheep. I traded him with you for a hog, didn't I?"

The German nodded and then asked for pay for the hog.

"Why should I pay you for the hog when I traded you the sheep for him?"

The German looked bewildered and said he must have pay for the sheep.

"Now, why should I pay you for what I haven't got?"

"Vell, den, I vant pay for my hog."

The Yankee smiled compassionately. "Didn't you trade me the hog for the sheep?"

The German nodded, looked tired, and said: "Dot's a——of a vay to do pizness!"

...heart wish! You ... wonderfully prosperous, ...ilkins.

Mr. Wilkins (sadly)—True, but after all I get only half the profits of my great establishment. I just tell you, my old friend, the mistake of my life was in taking a partner.

A little Rhode Island avenue girl came puffing into the house yesterday afternoon, and met her mother in the hall.

"Why, Flossie," she exclaimed, "what's the matter?"

"I just walked home, mamma," was the answer.

"What did you do that for? I gave you a quarter for a car ticket."

"Well, you see, mamma, it was this way: I gave the conductor the quarter and he put it in his mouth and said 'Is this good?' and I said no, it wasn't, because I never saw anybody eat a quarter, and then he handed it back to me and I didn't have any more money, so I got out and walked. Conductors don't eat money do they, mamma?"

"Would you like to leave?" said the wood-chopper to the Young Tree.

"I don't know but I would," answered the Young Tree. "Can you take me down with a hack?"

"I guess so," said the chopper; "seeing you've only got one small trunk."

Nothing Good Enough

Managing Editor—H'm! I understand that you are a graduate of a school of journalism. Am I right?

Applicant—Yes, sir. I have a diploma showing that I finished my course with honors.

Managing Editor—H'm! Yes, I'm sorry, but we haven't any position on this paper quite good enough for you.

Mother—John, you went to church as usual today?

Son—Yes, mother.

Mother—What was the text?

Son—Well, er—you see I didn't get there in time to hear the text.

Mother—What was the gist of the sermon?

Son—I can't tell. You see, mother, I came out just before he got to the gist.

A young man was calling on a Congressman's daughter the other evening, when the father appeared at the parlor door.

"May I come in?" he asked hesitatingly.

"Oh, yes," she answered, "you may, but we have a quorum without you."

Then he didn't.

Complimentary to Chagg.

"Chagg, is it true that Fludger has quit working for the Monthly Paralyzer?"

"Yes. He's out."

"I knew he wouldn't stay on that magazine a great while. He's too bright a man. They never keep anybody that has any sense very long. Do you know who's got his place?"

"Yes, I have it myself."

"You? By George, old fellow, I congratulate you! You'll have no trouble keeping that job, Chagg!"

A Southwest Georgia Justice of the Peace had listened to the evidence in a case that had been concluded. One of the lawyers arose to make a speech in favor of his client. The Judge listened patiently for half an hour, and then began writing on a piece of paper in front of him. A few minutes later he interrupted the lawyer by saying:

"Gentleman, when you finish your speeches, you will find my decision written on this piece of paper. You will have to excuse me for a while, as I have to plant some potato slips. Let me know when you have concluded, and I will return and sentence the prisoner." It is unnecessary to mention the fact, that another young lawyer had his finest effort cut short.

MY DELIVERER.

The following story was told by an old settler of the White Hills, many years ago. His name was Damon Clark, and he, and his father before him, well into a hundred years made the region north of the mountains their home.

I will give the story as near as I can remember in his own words, as he told it one evening when we sat out in front of the farm-house, with the great Presidential Range—Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Monroe and others—rising before us bathed in bright moonlight.

"I was born on this farm here," he said, by way of beginning. "The old cabin stood out yonder, where you can see those big maples. My father was one of the first to find his way up here, coming through the notch from the neighborhood of the seashore down by Portsmouth. I was about twenty-five years old, when the adventure I am about to relate chanced to me.

"One morning, in the month of September, I told my wife that I was going into the woods for a day's hunting.

"'I am afraid you will get wet before you return, Damon,' she said. 'Unless all signs fail, we shall have rain before night.'

"'A little water won't hurt me if it comes, Maudy. There ain't much that I can do if I stay at home, and I feel as though I'd like a bear-steak, or one of venison, for a change. It has been some time since I had one of your cooking. You know you can't be beat in that line. I was lucky in getting a wife who knew how to cook. One that don't, ain't fit to cumber the earth.'

"'There's enough of that, Damon. I'll spoil the next steak you bring in to pay you for this praise, which you know you do not mean.'

"In spite of her words, I knew that she was pleased. A woman likes to be praised once in a while whether she deserves it or not.

"I took my rifle and started off for the forest. I thought myself there would be rain before nightfall. Great masses of black clouds hung over the mountains, and came a long distance down their sides. They seemed to be so full of water that it was impossible for them to rise up and float away.

"When I wanted to make sure of all the game I could carry, I went straight to the foot of the Mountains, and then taking one of the narrow ravines which led up among them, I would in a little time be loaded down with all the game I could carry home. "I went in this direction now. As I neared the foot of the mountains, the sun disappeared behind the clouds, and soon after the air commenced to grow cooler, while at the same time it grew darker amid the trees, as though night were coming on.

"The clouds increased fast, and looking up at the summit of the great mountains above my head, I could see the great masses of vapor rolling away into what clear sky still remained to the northwest. A storm was surely coming, but whether it would hold off until nightfall was more than I could determine.

"Be that as it would, I had no thought of turning back. If I got wet to the skin, I was not at all fearful that it would do me harm.

"I entered the narrow valley and slowly made my way up, keeping now a sharp lookout for game, which I expected now to come upon at any moment, as the ravine was a [illegible] place for it.

"The deer, feeding on the coarse grass and stunted shrubs high up on the rocks, came down hither to find the shade and to slake their thirst in the sparkling water of the brook which leaped and gurgled in the bottom of the valley.

"Suddenly I saw a noble buck standing on a rock, with head aloft, and gazing in my direction as though he scented me.

"I raised my rifle and fired.

"The buck leaped high in the air, and then fell down among the rocks.

"After reloading my rifle, I went up to him, and found that he was motionless, the bullet having entered between the eyes.

"I was bending over the deer, feasting my eyes on the prize I had got, when suddenly a vivid flash of ligetning almost blinded me, followed by a peal of thunder, which shook the rocks beneath my feet. A moment later great drops of rain began to fall. One of those tempests and rainfalls so common among the mountains was close upon me. I could hear it roaring like a waterfall as it came rushing down from the lofty heights above me.

"I knew that I should be drenched to the skin in a minute after it struck, and I glanced hastily about me in search of a place of shelter from its fury.

"I was close to the foot of the mountain where on one side it came down into the ravine, and as I glanced up and down along its base my eyes fell upon a dark aperture which seemed to lead in among the rocks. Within might be a cavern large enough to give me shelter.

"Another tremendous peal of thunder hastened my steps, although I was mindful of the errand on which I had come.

"I dragged the carcass of the deer after me, and in a few minutes had it in the cavern, where I could prepare it in a shape for carrying home when the storm should be over.

"I did not seek to fathom the depths of the cavern. Behind me all was blackness which no eye could penetrate.

"I thought I had seen terrific storms in the mountains, but I had to admit that nothing in my recollection came near to this.

"Instead of drops, the rain seemed to come down by the bucketful. There was almost a continual flash of lightning, while the roll of the thunder was deafening.

"But safe and dry, and intent upon my work of skinning the deer and quartering it up, I did not pay much heed to the tempest, whose roaring filled my ears with a terrible din.

"But, suddenly I started up, with something very like fright tugging at my heart.

"The earth trembled where I stood. There was a terrible, horrible, grinding roar, which seemed to come from up the mountain directly above me.

"In a moment I knew what it was. A land-slide was coming.

"My first impulse was to rush out of the cavern, and I did take a step in that direction, but in a moment I saw that it would be a rash act on my part.

"Almost stunned by the terrible noise above me, I stood motionless.

"There was a rush and a roar above my head. It lasted for a minute, and then all was still. No sound could be heard, but the blackness of the darkest night was about me.

"In a moment I comprehended my situation. I was buried alive.

"The entrance of the cavern was completely blocked up, and I entombed even more surely than if I had been laid away by human hands.

"What was I to do? How was I to escape from my living grave?

"There was but one way that I could conceive of, and that was to dig out.

"Without tools, this might prove a task more than I could accomplish, as the rocks and dirt heaped up at the mouth of the cavern might be many yards in thickness.

"Hope of escape seemed well-nigh impossible, and my heart sank within me as I realized my terrible condition.

"Another sound startled me, and caused me to turn my head in the direction of the back part of the cavern.

"All I could see was a pair of eyes, glowing dimly in the darkness.

"But the sound I knew well. It was the deep growl of a bear.

"I had company, to share with me my living tomb. The sound it made, told me that the brute was moving in my direction.

"I raised my rifle and took aim between the shining eyes. Another moment and I should have pulled the trigger, but a sudden thought flashed across my mind.

"A bear can dig well, and it might help me to escape.

"Instead therefore, of giving it a bullet, I seized one of the quarters of venison and threw it in its direction.

"There was another and deeper growl, and then a munching sound told me that it had commenced its feast.

"It took another quarter to satisfy its appetite, and then it began to approach me nearer.

There was some leaves and sticks scattered at my feet. These I scraped together, and to the pile added a tow garment that I wore. Then, with a flint and steel, I struck a light and soon had a flame blazing up which illuminated the interior of the cavern.

"By it I saw that a huge rock had completely filled up the entrance, so that escape was impossible.

"I looked toward my brute companion. For an instant it stared at me and the fire, then turned and retreated rapidly.

"Hope sprang up in my heart. There must be another passage leading out of the cavern, through which the bear had gone.

"Making as good a torch as possible out of the burning fuel, I soon discovered that this was the case and a current of air told me that it led to the outer world. When the bear had gone I could follow, and in a little time I stood outside in the pouring rain and howling wind.

"I looked about for my deliverer, the bear, but it was nowhere to be seen. I would not have harmed a hair on its body for its weight in gold. I bore it too much gratitude for that.

"I had no easy task in getting home, but I reached there by nightfall, thankful for my escape from what might have proved a living tomb."

Extend sympathy to some people, and they begin to cough all the more loudly, to show you how bad they are.

Some people think they pay a debt by telling their creditors every other day that they owe it.

Listening to some people tell a story is equal to judging a view by what you can see through a dusty window.

"Do you like your new mamma, Charlie?" was asked of a precocious youngster of six. "No," he said loftily; "I do not care for ladie's society."

Mabel—Did you hear that Bessie Willis was married yesterday to Tom Guzzler?

Maud—Really? I thought she would be the last person to marry him.

Mabel—Well, she was, wasn't she?

A 14 year old boy went into his mother's presence with one eye black, his lip swollen, and a ragged scratch across his cheek, and blood from which he had wiped off on his shirt sleeve. "Nicodemus," cried the parent, as he sneaked in, "have you been fighting again?"

"Nope," he sullenly granted.

"Then what on earth ails your face?"

"Jim Green's ma's dead," he replied.

"Well, suppose she is, what's that got to do with your bunged up face?"

"I seed Jim just now," answered the boy, "an, he looked awful sad and soleminsome."

"Well?"

"I didn't know what ter do to make him bright and chipper like, an' feelin' so sorry for him, I jest went up an' let him hit me a few licks."

"Did it help him?" asked the mother.

"Help him!" echoed the boy in a surprised tone, "course it did! Don't you think it'd make you feel good to bust a fellow that way what had licked you every week for a year?"

Huntersville, W. Va.

May 1, 1890.

The wealth of the kingdom of Great Britain is estimated at $50,000,000,000.

The letter with money in it is always delayed, but the letter with a bill is always on time.

Expenses of witnesses in the Cronin murder trial at Chicago, reached $5000; legal expenses, $20,000; stenographers and type-writers, $10,000; the jury, $8,000, and the total cost $100,000.

Our four new States are healthy, well grown children. Washington contains an area of 38,726,400 acres, and has a population of 275,000. Montana contains 93,263,0000 acres, with a population of 185,306. North Dakota embraces 48,595,000 acres with a population of 271,000, and South Dakota has an area of 49,708,800 acres, with a population of 379,000.

In 1879 the value of the South's agricultural products was $571,000,000 in 1888 it was $739,000,000, and in 1889 about $850,000,000. In 1879 the South produced 431,000,000 bushels of grain, and in 1888 632,000,000 bushels, and the yield for 1889 will probably show 650,000,000 to 675,000,000 bushels. In 1879 the value of the live stock in the South was $391,400,000, and in 1889 it had jumped to $560,100,000.

It is believed that the largest farm under cultivation in this country belongs to Colonel John W. Bookwalter, of Ohio. The farm is on the Nebraska line south of Beatrice, and the Kansas City Wyandotte and Northwestern road runs through it that contains nearly 13,000 acres, covering twenty square miles, all under excellent state of cultivation.

Rowan county, Kentucky, the scene of the late murderous demonstrations of the moonshine distillers, lies in a mountainous region of that State, and in the last Presidential election gave a majority for Harrison. In the [illegible] of 1888 the moonshiners were [illegible] ed by the Republican [illegible] and [illegible] that in the event of Harrison's election the internal tax on whisky would be repealed. Relying upon this promise, they gave a large vote to the Republican party and elected two Republicans to the present Congress. When the Republican Administration [illegible] into power they became [illegible] in their contraband pursuit, and now fiercely resist the revenue officers who are [illegible] to break them up.

A TRUE STORY.

The American workingman [illegible] home at night from his toil clad in a woolen suit taxed 40 per cent; stockings and under shirt taxed [illegible] per cent., and perchance a pair of gloves in winter taxed 40 per cent.

He carries in his hand a dinner pail taxed 45 per cent., and greets his wife with a cheery smile as she looks at him through a window pane taxed 80 per cent., from which she has drawn aside the curtains taxed 40 per cent.

After scraping his boots on a scraper taxed 45 per cent., he wipes them on a mat of bagging 16 per cent.; he lifts the door latch taxed 43 per cent., steps in on a carpet taxed 68 per cent., and gives a kiss to his wife in a woolen dress taxed 70 per cent. She has a needle taxed 25 per cent. in her hand, with which she has been mending with thread taxed 40 per cent. an alpaca umbrella taxed 50 per cent.

It is a small brick house which they have bought with their hard earnings of a building association. The bricks were taxed 20 per cent., the lumber taxed 16 per cent., and the paint 54 per cent. The wall paper, taxed 45 per cent., makes the room brighter with its plain furniture taxed 35 per cent. He hangs his pail on a steel pin taxed 45 per cent., and proceeds to get ready for his supper. He washes his hands with castile soap taxed 20 per cent, in a tin basin taxed 45 per cent. He then goes to the looking glass taxed 45 per cent, and fixes his hair with a brush and comb taxed 30 per cent.

He is now ready for his supper which his wife has cooked on a stove taxed 45 per cent., with pots and kettles taxed 53 per cent. The table is spread with the commonest crockery, taxed 56 per cent., and he drinks his water out of a cheap glass tumbler taxed 45 per cent.

The little sugar that he puts in his tea is taxed 80 per cent., and he stirs it with a spoon taxed 45 per cent.

His meal is a frugal one because hard times have cut his wages down by making a dollar buy less, and he is saving every cent to pay the next instalment due on his home.

With an appetite worthy of an ampler meal he takes up his knife and fork taxed 45 per cent., and begins to eat a piece of salt flesh, taxed 25 per cent.

He pours on vineager, taxed 36 per cent. Upon his boiled potatoes, taxed 40 per cent., he sprinkles salt, taxed 80 per cent., and eats a small pickle, taxed 35 per cent. He ends his meal with a pudding of rice taxed 112 per cent.—Ex.

COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE.

Wm. Gibbs.
vs.
C. A. Yeager & others.

Notice is hereby given to all persons interested in the above cause, that pursuant to a decree of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, rendered in said cause on the 9th day of April, 1890, I shall proceed as Commissioner of said Court, at my office in the town of Huntersville, in said County,

ON TUESDAY, 27TH DAY OF MAY, 1890, to take the following matters of account to-wit:

1st. An account of all the liens on the lands of the defendant, C. A. Yeager, with their amounts, dignities and priorities.

2nd. An account of all the lands owned by the defendant, C. A. Yeager, with their location, probable value, and whether said lands will rent in five years for a sufficient amount to pay off and discharge the liens against the same.

3rd. Any matter deemed pertinent by the Commissioner or required to be specially stated by any party in interest.

F. C. MOORE, Com'r.

May 1-4t. Printer's fee $6.40.

COMMISSIONER'S NOTICE.

George J. Rivercomb, Special Receiver,
vs.
A. G. Bonner.

All parties interested will hereby take notice, that pursuant to decrees of the Pocahontas County Circuit Court, entered on the 8th and 9th days of April 1890, in the above styled cause, I will at my office in the town of Huntersville, W. Va., on the 30th day of May, 1890, proceed to take, state and report the following matters of account:

1st. An account showing all the liens on the 100 acres of land of the defendant A. G. Bonner in the bill and proceedings mentioned, their dignities, priorities and amounts.

2nd. A statement showing what part of the plaintiffs said judgment has been paid by the defendant A. G. Bonner, and what part thereof has been paid by D. V. [illegible], Peter [illegible], John F. Bonner, John A. Bonner and J. W. Bonner respectively.

3rd. Any other matter deemed pertinent by the Commissioner, or required to be specially stated by any in interest.

L. M. McCLINTIC, Com'r.

May 1-4t. Printer's fee $6.40.

Commissioner's Sale of Land.

Pursuant to a decree of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, West Virginia, rendered on the 8th day of April 1890, in the Chancery Cause of Jacob Piles vs. John Piles and others, I as special Commissioner shall proceed to sell at public auction to the highest bidder, in front of the Court House of said Pocahontas County on the

16TH DAY OF JUNE, 1890,

2 tracts of land, one containing 61 acres more less, lying on the waters of Beaver Lick creek; the other containing 200 acres, more or less, adjoining the first mentioned tract, lying on Stephenson's Ridge, South East side of Greenbrier River, in said Pocahontas County West Virginia. A portion of this land has been heretofore held by Isaac Dean, Josiah Sims and others, but it is all subject to the liens of legacies and judgments reported and decreed in this cause.

The unaliened lands will be first sold, and then that aliened in the inverse order of alienation.

The title to this land is clear; a portion of it is well timbered; it lies well and is considered valuable farming and grazing land.

TERMS OF SALE:

So much cash in hand as will pay costs of suit and expenses of sale. On the balance, a credit of Six, Twelve and Eighteen months will be given, the purchaser executing bond with good security, bearing interest from day of sale, and a lien will be retained as ultimate security.

H. S. RUCKER, Sp'l Com'r.

Bond has been given by the above Com'r as required by law.

JOHN J. BEARD, Cl'k.

—Dr. Jno. Ligon, of Clover Lick, was in town last Thursday nigh.

—Geo. W. Whiting, of Academy, was in Huntersville last Friday.

—Peter Hill, Esq., of Jacox, was a visitor to our city last week.

—Several lumbermen are stopping in town, waiting for the camps to start up.

—Howard Donaldson, well known in the lumber camps of our county, got sent up for six years in Ky. for counterfeiting.

—J. C. Loury, Jr. has been on the sick list for a few days past, but we are glad to say is able to be out again.

—Attorney H. S. Rucker, had the misfortune to have his little bay mare die last Friday.

—Martin Madden, Esq., of the Buckhannon marble works, called to see us Monday.

—Melvina Gordon, of the Infirmary at Hillsboro, was lodged in jail at this place, on a charge of lunacy.

—J. W. Milligan, Esq., and family, will start in a few days for Buchanan, Va., where they expect to make their future home.

—Dick Mays, of Split Rock, was in Elkins this week, having moved D. H. Garber, here from Marlinton. Elkins News.

—We are pleased to place on our exchange list this week, the Clifton Forge and Iron Gate Review. It is an 8 col. folio and presents a first-class appearance.

—A faded or gray beard may be colored a beautiful and natural brown or black, at will, by using Buckingham's Dye for the Whiskers.

—Miss Laura Feamster, of Lewisburg and Mr. F. W. Taylor, of Morristown, Tenn., were married in the former place, on the 11th inst., so says the Independent.

—The opinion of those who have seen Dr. John Ligon's Patent Farm Fence, is that it is the best thing out. There is a few panels built in Huntersville. Every farmer should see it.

—Messrs. J. C. Loury, Jr., and J. H. Doyle, have received [illegible] a Patent Handler, [illegible] which [illegible] little step ladder [illegible] thing, and no doubt [illegible] with the merchants.

—Covington, Va., is booming.

—Attorney H. S. Rucker, and family, accompanied by Sam. Scott, Esq., started last Saturday for a few weeks visit to their parents in Lewisburg and near Lynchburg.

—The County Court of Randolph Co., refused to submit to a vote a proposition to remove the court house from Beverly to Elkins, whereon the Circuit Judge granted a mandamus which was asked for. They will have a lively time.

—The Daily Charleston Gazette, was printed in red ink in honor of its second birthday. The Gazette is a good newspaper, and we are glad to say is having the success it so well merits.

—Minne Ashcraft and pal, supposed to be Chas. Bush, were arrested in Cincinnati on a charge of dealing very extensively in "green goods." They are known among the lumber camps of this county.

—Wm. Dovenspike, formerly of Pa., but for the last three years of our Co., we understand, passed himself off for an internal revenue collector at White Sulphur Springs and collected quite a little "stake" of internal revenue. He was in town about a week ago.

—The value of a remedy should be estimated by its curative properties. According to this standard, Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the best and most economical blood medicine in the market, because the most pure and concentrated. Price $1. Worth $5 a bottle.

—A dry, hacking cough keeps the bronchial tubes in a state of constant irritation, which, if not speedily removed, may lead to bronchitis. No prompter remedy can be had than Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which is both an anodyne and expectorant.

—Wm. Kerr, was arrested near Green Bank, last Thursday by deputy sheriff L. W. Herold, on a capias profine from Randolph Co., and lodged in jail in this place.

—Basic City, one mile east of the C. & O. and N. V. railroad, is on a boom. On the 8th, a large number of lots will be sold at public auction by the company. Attorney C. F. Moore, and probably others of this place and vicinity, will attend the sale.

—Why can't Huntersville get up a boom? Look at Va., just across the mountain here; she is booming. Why, we are told that one goes to sleep over there, with nothing to disturb the quiet slumbers of farm life, save the croak of the frog, to the hoot of the night owl, to be waked in the morning by the toot of the mighty engine and the busy hum of a thriving city, built all over his farm.

—Capt. R. A. Smith, wife, and little girl and C. B. Swecker, Esq., of Dunmore, took dinner in town Tuesday, on their way to Charleston. Mr. Smith is summoned on the petit jury in that place, and Mr. Swecker as a witness for the U. S. against John [illegible] for robbing the mail between this place and [illegible] more a few years ago. Also Mr. Jas. W. Warwick, Jr. is the same morning for the same place, where he is summoned as a witness in the same case.

—The Southern Methodists are looking to the completion of their new church in order to have it dedicated in the fall. The church is handsome and attractive, modern in design, [illegible]

Mrs. Angeline McNeil, died last Friday morning at 3 o'clock, aged 71 years.

Mr. N. C. McNeil, is worse at this writing but but it is hoped not seriously so.

Mrs. Clark Kellison, is still quite sick.

Born to Charles L. McNeil, and wife, a girl on April 18th. Who is prouder than Charley!

Misses. E. J. Buckley and Nevada McNeel, are visiting relatives in Ronceverte.

Green Bank News.

Mr. Jas. Stretch, has moved his family to Mrs. Maupin's in town.

Misses Emma and Lula Barner, were visiting their grandma Mrs. Sarah Clark the latter part of last week.

W. L. Taylor will move to the Hickman house this week.

Ellis W. Curry, lost a valuable work-horse last week.

The many friends of Mr. J. H. Curry, Sr., were glad to see him at church Sunday, the first time for several months on account of his protracted illness.

A postal to Wm. H. Hull, yesterday states that R. A. Yeager will start for Green Bank, with his family the first of May.

Transfers of Real Estate.

The following is a list of transfers of real estate for the month of April:

A deed from Jas. B. Canfield and wife, of Gordonsville, Va., to Jno. E. Campbell, for lot in Huntersville.

From H. Nathan, to Jas. A. Larue, for lot in Hillsboro.

From Granville Eastham, to L. H. Stephenson, for land on Allegheny mountain.

From Jno. A. McNeel and wife, to Brown M. Yeager, for land on Laurel creek.

From Jno. A. Slaughter and wife, of Lynchburg, Va., to R. M. Yeager, for land on Greenbrier river.

A deed of lease from A. R. McComb, to Jacob Bouer, for dwelling and store house, in Huntersville.

From Andrew Dilley, to Wm. H. Dilley, for all rights and interests in land on Thorny creek.

Marlinton Movements.

The past few days have been quite like spring. The farmers are busy putting in oats and preparing ground for corn. Considerable gardening done.

The sale advertised in THE TIMES, by Mr. D. H. Garber, was largely attended and booming prices paid for the [illegible] things sold. There seemed to be no scarcity of money. The community regrets the departure of this nice family. THE TIMES will raise a crowd every time.

Aaron Kee, Esq., one of our most worthy and prosperous citizens, has greatly improved his residence. He was hindered in the good work, however, by the burning of some very nice lumber that was in process of seasoning. About fifteen hundred feet lost.

A new engine, to replace the one that exploded so disastrously a few weeks ago, passed here Tuesday on the way to Elk.

We are in the midst of the proverbial "six hungry weeks," and were it not for "lean fruit," it would be hard to enjoy living just now. As Mr. Ira Skinner, our Driftwood correspondent would say:

"Were it not for gravy and eggs,
One could hardly carry his two legs,
For something fresh one vainly seeks
While getting through six hungry weeks."

Mrs. Angeline McNeil [illegible] highly [illegible] ill but is more comfortable for the time being. For the present she is at the house of her daughter, Mrs. Buckley, near Buckeye. It is very comforting to one's faith to see how she is sustained by her faith in her Savior, who has gone to prepare a place for her in the House of Many Mansions.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that Contain Mercury,

as mercury will destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescription from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is 10 fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and it is taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. Advice to Mothers.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used when children are cutting teeth. It relieves the little sufferer at once; it produces natural, quiet sleep, and the little cherub awakes as "bright as a button." It is very pleasant to taste. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, regulates the bowels, and is the best known remedy for diarrhoea, whether arising from teething or other causes. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

A Lelsure Moment; A Jotting For "The Times."

ED. OF THE TIMES:

The following note invites attention to a very instructive and beautiful poem.

As is well and widely known, General Skeen has been a distinguished member of the Virginia Bar for more than forty years.

In connexion with his eminent legal abilities, he possesses a correctly cultured taste for the best literature, and much of his remarkable influence with juries is due to the forcible illustrations derived from the noblest productions of poetic genius, and eloquence imbued by a correct appreciation of the masters of human speech.

W. T. P.

Huntersville, W. Va., April 6,'90.

REV. WM. T. PRICE:

I have not the pleasure of your wife's acquaintance, but I know that she is an occasional visitor to the "Temple of the Muses," and I therefore desire you to call her attention to this production of her sister "Amelia," for it certainly required "earth's noblest thing, a woman perfected" to pen the lines "which breathe" and words that pray in [illegible] of the Pulpit Eloquence.

Very truly, your friend,
WM. SKEEN.

PULPIT ELOQUENCE.

The following beautiful lines were written many years ago for the Louisville Journal by a distinguished poetess of Maryland, signed "Amelia."

The day was declining—the breeze in its glee
Had left the fair blossom to sing on the sea,
As the sun in its gorgeousness, radiant and still,
Dropped down like a gem from the brow of the hill.
One tremulous star in the glory of June
Came out with a smile and sat down by the moon,
As she graced her blue throne with the pride of a queen,
The smile of her loveliness gladdened the scene.

The scene was enchanting! In distance away
Rolled the foam-crested waves of the Chesapeake Bay;
While bathing in the moonlight the village was seen
With the church in the distance that stood on the green,
The soft-sloping meadows lay brightly unrolled,
With their mantles of verdure and blossoms of gold,
And the earth in her beauty, forgetting to grieve,
Lay asleep in her bloom on the bosom of eve.

A light-hearted child, I had wandered away
From the spot where my footsteps had gamboled all day;
And free as a bird's was the song of my soul,
As I heard the wild waters exultingly roll;
While lightening my heart as I sported along
With bursts of low laughter and snatches of song,
I struck in the pathway half worn o'er the sod
By the feet that went up to the worship of God.

As I traced its green windings, a murmur of prayer
With the hymn of the worshippers rose on the air,
And drawn by the links of its sweetness along,
I stood unobserved in the midst of the throng.
For awhile my young spirit still wandered about
With the birds, and the winds, that were singing without,
But birds, waves, and zephyrs, were quickly forgot
In one angel-like being that brightened the spot.

In stature majestic, apart from the throng,
He stood in his beauty, the theme of my song!
His cheek pale with fervor—the blue orbs above
Yet the heart-glowing rapture that beamed from those eyes
Seemed saddened by sorrow, and chastened by sighs,
As if the young heart in its bloom had grown cold
With its loves unrequited, its sorrows untold.
Such language as his may I never recall,
But his theme was salvation—salvation to all—
And the souls of a thousand in ecstacy hung
On the manna-like sweetness that dropped from his tongue.
Not alone on the ear his wild eloquence stole;
Enforced by each gesture, it sunk to the soul,
Till it seemed that an angel had brightened the sod,
And brought to each bosom a message from God.

He spoke of the Saviour—what pictures he drew!
The scenes of his suffering rose clear on my view—
The cross—the rude cross, where he suffered and died;
The gush of bright crimson that flowed from his side;
The cup of his sorrows—the wormwood and gall;
The darkness that mantled the earth as a pall;
The garland of thorns: and demon-like crews
Who knelt as they scoffed him, "Hail, King of the Jews!"

He spoke, and it seemed that his statute-like form
Expanded and glowed, as his spirit warm;
His tone so impassioned—so melting his air,
As touched with compassion he ended in prayer;
His hands clasped above him—his blue orbs upthrown,
Still pleading for sins that were never his own,
While that mouth where such sweetness ineffably clung,
Still spoke, though expression had died on his tongue.

O God? what emotions the speaker awoke;
A mortal he seemed—yet a Deity spoke;
A man—yet so far from humanity riven;
On earth—yet so closely connected with heaven!
How oft' in my fancy I've pictured him there
As he stood in that triumph of passion and prayer,
With his eyes closed in rapture—their transient eclipse
Made bright by the smiles that illumined his lips.

There's a charm in delivery—a magical art
That thrills like a kiss, from the lip to the heart;
'Tis the glance—the expression—the well-chosen word—
By whose magic the depths of the spirit are stirred;
The smile—the mute gesture—the s[illegible] startling pause—
The eye's sweet expression, that m[illegible] w[illegible] it awe;—
The lip's soft persuasion, its musical tone;
O such was the charm of that eloquent one!

The time is long past—yet how clearly defined
That bay, church, and village, float up on my mind;
I see amid azure the moon in her pride,
With the sweet little trembler that sat by her side;
I hear the blue waves, as she wanders along,
And I tread in the pathway worn o'er the sod
By the feet that went up to the worship of God.

The time is long past—yet what visions I see!
The past, the dim past, is the present to me;
I am standing once more 'mid that heart-stricken throng,
A vision floats up—'tis the theme of my song—
All glorious and bright as a spirit of air,
The light, like a halo encircling his hair,
As I catch the same accents of sweetness and love,
He whispers of Jesus, and points us above.

How sweet to my heart is the picture I've traced!
Its chain of bright fancies seem almost effaced,
Till Memory, the fond one that sits in the soul,
Took up the frail links, and collected the whole,
As the dew to the blossom, the bud to the bee—
As the scent to the rose—are those memories to me.
Round the chords of my heart they have tremblingly clung,
And the echo it gives is the song I have sung.

Pater—My boy, when I was your age I was at my desk at 7 o'clock in the morning. The Son—That may be, but I know the business is perfectly safe in your hands, even while I'm away.

The women are getting bolder. One was seen carrying a corset box on the streets to-day in broad day light.

THE COURTS.

Circuit Court convenes on the first Monday in April, 3rd Monday in June and 3rd Monday in October.

County Court convenes on the 1st Tuesday in January, March, October and second Tuesday in July. July is levy term.

SKIPPER BEN'S GIRL.

If, in your travels, you ever visit the rugged coast of New England, you may come upon "The Cove," with its cluster of brown, gray and black wooden houses having queer, uneven roofs and crooked chimneys, and its narrow strip of pebbly beach, backed by high, forbidding rocks.

You are very likely to find boats drawn up upon this beach, some of them overturned for calking, and great heaps of hemp and seaweed and layers of salt hay, showing how far up the water comes at high tide.

And climbing over the boats or playing along the beach, I am quite sure you will find a little girl in a faded pink frock, whose hair is like seaweed a rich chestnut underneath, but faded to a sort of nutty tinge where the sun strikes it.

If you ask this little girl who she is she will peep shyly up through her tangled hair, with a pair of eyes that will win your love and admiration at once, and answer, "Dolly!"

Then she will run away and hide among the boats, with her brown curls shaken over her blushing cheeks.

But if you ask one else—say the lobster man yonder examining his lobster pots beside his warped and leaky old dory, or, better still, old Capt. Graves, as he stands on the wharves every day, or sits by the stove in 'Lisha Tucker's store, telling of the fishing when he was young, he will say:

"Thet! oh, thet's Skipper Ben's gal!"

It is a strange story, and it all happened some years ago—a great many years ago, Dolly would say, when Skipper was not a skipper at all, but merely a brown-skinned young fisherman.

He lived with his old mother in the little brown house that stands quite by itself by the water side, and whose eaves almost touch the ground. And over in the blackish looking cottage, with the shingles down the side, lived his sweetheart—a rosy lass named Dolly.

They had always been friends ever since they were old enough to go about, and sailed boats together in the pools among the rocks, or fished from the wharve. As they grew older, the Cove "just kind of understood" that they were to be married as soon as Ben should become owner or part owner of a fishing vessel.

Ben was an industrious fellow, and was always off at the Banks. Each time he came home he laid a little money away in an old stocking, for he was saving up to buy his boat, and once, while he was on a fishing cruise with Captain Pratt, the captain told him of a prime little schooner he had at home in the Cove, which Ben might secure for the contents of his stocking and in payment for his services that season.

Ben came home a happy youth. He had already christened his new possession the Dolly. And as he walked up the little narrow street of the little fishing town he wondered why all his old comrades should look at him with such solemn pitying glances.

Poor Ben! He soon learned why they all looked pitying at him. His sweetheart, Dolly was dead. Two weeks before she had been buried in the little graveyard upon the hill.

Poor Ben, indeed!

He was never the same man afterward. He kept the Dolly and took pride in her, going off to the Banks and becoming in time one of the best fishermen in the Cove. But he never was a boy again; all his old light-heartedness had vanished, and he became grave, moody and silent. For some years he lived, when he was at home, alone in the little brown house—for his old mother was dead, too. A lonely time he had of it, when he was not at the Banks. In the evenings he would sit for hours with his pipe, staring into the fire, and thinking how different it might all have been if only Dolly had lived.

One night there was a terrible storm, and Skipper Ben sat by his lonely hearth, smoking and thinking. The wind blew and howled about the little brown house. It rushed down the chimney, and beat against the side of the house until it rocked. But Ben does not notice a bit of wind.

Presently his gloomy thoughts got the better of him. The tiny room seemed to grow as narrow and as suffocating as a grave, and he rushed out into the night and the storm, where he could draw in deep breaths of the wild, salt air.

There was no rain, but the clouds were scurrying swiftly across the sky, And well they might, with such a wind at their heels.

Such a wind! If Ben had not been the broad, sturdy fellow that he was, it would have blown him off his feet. But as it was, he strode up and down the beach with long, fierce strides, and heeded neither the wind nor the roaring surf.

Was it strange that, with the fierce storm raging without, and the equally fierce storm raging within, Skipper Ben should not have heard the shriek and cries of distress that night? Not so very strange, I think, but what was strange was that, above all the din and commotion, he should have heard a feeble wail—the faintest little wail in the world.

But he heard it, at any rate, and hurried to the spot whence it came.

There, lying on the beach, with its frock securely fastened to a broken spar, was a little child.

"Why you poor little creeter!" exclaimed Ben, as he unfastened the dress. "How 'n the world did you git out here?"

The baby stopped crying as soon as she saw him, and stretching out her tiny arms, gave a little chuckle of delight.

He picked her up tenderly, and, wringing out the soaked little garments, which were like cobwebs, and were trimmed with the finest lace, buttoned her up inside his heavy jacket.

Then it was that he heard the shouts and cries for the first time, and saw men running helplessly up and down the beach, and gazing seaward.

What were they looking at? Looking at nothing. They were staring and gaping at the place where a good ship had just gone to pieces. Could no one be saved? No, it was impossible. No boat could live in such a surf, and there is, moreover, no lifeboat at the Cove.

The ship went to pieces where she struck. Of all the crew no one lived to tell the tale, and of all the passengers, not one was saved—except the little baby buttoned up under Skipper Ben's rough pilot jacket.

But the baby lived, and was like a sunbeam in the little brown house, for no one talked of putting her in the "Asylum." Nor is there any orphan asylum at the Cove, though there are orphans, in plenty, for many a good fellow goes to the Banks never to return, not supposing that he has said good-by for the last time to the youngsters at home.

The baby cried for "mamma" a little at first, but she soon learned to say "Ben" instead. And from that day on, the little room never became narrow and stuffy, and Ben's pipe was the pipe of peace and comfort.

The next year, when he went to the Bank's, he left her in the care of 'Lisha Tucker's wife, at the store; but the year after she cried so hard when he was going that he took her with him. And ever since she has been his constant companion. And he named her—Dolly. Five years have passed since that stormy night, and Dolly is six years old. She is a bright, happy little girl, and loves the grim old ocean dearly, even if it did so nearly become her tomb. Sometimes in the evening, when the wind is howling and shaking the little brown house, and the fire is roaring brightly and merrily up the chimney, Skipper Ben will tell Dolly how he found her lying on the beach, securely fastened to a broken spar.

Then he will pull out a little, old, worn leather trunk, and will take from it the once dainty baby clothes. They are yellow now and still stained with sea water. He will hold the delicate fabric in his hard, rough hand with reverential awe, and look with wonder at the little faced blue ribbons that once were shoulder knots.

"I wonder who your parents was?" he says to Dolly. "Only think what you might ha' been! Why, you might ha' been a Markis!"

Skipper Ben's round blue eyes become rounder and bluer at the thought, and he takes his pipe from his mouth.

"You might ha' been a Dorches!" But Dolly shakes her head with its brown curls and lays her cheek against Ben's rough coat, saying,

"No, no! I'd rather be skipper Ben's girl!"

My father was Sheriff of a certain county in Kansas about twenty years ago, and during a certain summer we received a sentence for six months a tough fellow named Joe Williams. He had been sentenced for attempted horse stealing, and my father knew that a sharp watch must be kept over him or he would take French leave.

Joe had put in about two weeks on his term when my mother started off on a visit, was hurt en route, and father had to go to her. His first deputy and assistant jailer a man of fifty, named Stebbins, who was his cousin. "Steb" was a peppery old chap and a great brag and liar. According to his statements he had licked more men, killed more Indians, run down more horse thieves and helped lynch more desperadoes than any other man living. Father cautioned him over and over about watching Williams, who was the only prisoner we had, and "Steb" scornfully replied:

"You go right along and rest easy Henry. If I was fool 'nuff to let him git away I'd expect to be shot and throwed to the gophers."

Father had scarcely gone when Williams began calling, and I went into the corridor with the old man to see what was wanted. I was only ten years old, but I can vividly recall everything. The jail was made of rough stone and one-half of it was the Sheriff's residence. The jail part was only one big room, with a plain but stout iron grated door leading into the corridor. As the weather was warm, both corridor doors were open. When we looked in on Joe he said:

"See here, Steb, I hear you are bragging a good deal about how many men you have put on their backs."

"There's no brag about it," replied the old man. "I never found a human I couldn't lay down in five minutes."

"That's all wind, and you know it," retorted Joe. "You ought to be ashamed of your jaw."

"Who you talking to?"

"To you, you old wind bag! You talk of wrestling! Why, I kin grease the floor with your carcass!"

"Don't git my dander up!" warned Steb in a tremulous voice, "or I'll trounce you!"

"Trounce me! Say, old blowhard I kin lather you with one hand tied behind me! If I could only git at you I'd make you holler in one round!"

"Shet up!"

"I won't, and you ain't big 'nuff to make me!"

"Yes, I am!"

"You're a liar!"

"Take that back!"

"Never!"

"Take that back or I'll come in and make pulp of you!"

"You dasn't! I'll dare ye to come in and put a finger at me!"

Some more of the sort followed, and Steb got the idea that he must enforce his authority or suffer a loss of prestige. He was the older but also the bigger man, and he kept getting mad until he finally peeled off his coat, unlocked the door and dodged in. He made for Williams, but the latter ducked under his arm, upset, me at the door, and was off like a shot, and before pursuit could be organized he was beyond reach. Old Steb stood in the back door and watched him for fully five minutes before saying a word. Then I heard him growl.

"Consarn him for skipping out, but I've got the consolation of knowing that he's the forty-third man I've licked outer his boots in the last five years!"

"Sir," he said to the barkeeper of a saloon on Michigan avenue "I represent the United States Government."

"Yes—exactly. Have a drink?"

"I don't care if I do."

"What will you take?"

"Brandy."

It was placed before him, and after he had taken a pull, the barkeeper queried:

"Internal revenue, I suppose?"

"No."

"Don't you belong to the custom house?"

"Oh, no."

"Postoffice?"

"No."

"Some port official?"

"No."

"Then how do you represent the government?"

"As a humble citizen, sir—a man whose great grandfather fought at Lexington."

"Oh, that's it. Well, let's see how well you can fight at Detroit."

And he flung him over a table and booted him out doors, and the representative of the government had no fight in him. On the contrary, when he was safe across the street he said:

"That's 20 cents' worth of brandy for 10 cents' worth of licking and the United States is way ahead!"

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[Fr]om our regular correspondent.]

[W]ASHINGTON, D. C., May 2.—Sen[ato]r Voorhees of the Library Com[mi]ttee reported the Senate joint [re]solution accepting the battle [sw]ord of the late Capt. Samuel [Re]id tendered as a gift from his son [S]amuel C. Reid. It provided for [th]e presentation of a gold medal to [th]e donor. Captain Reid command[ed] the privateer "Gen. Armstrong" [in] the battle of Payal, and rebuked [an]d resisted with great slaughter [th]e English men-of-war. Gen. [Ja]ckson said that the delay occas[io]ned by this battle enabled him to [d]efend New Orleans. Senator [G]orman opposed the resolution [fo]r the reason that the victory was [ga]ined by a privateer whose mo[ti]ves, he imagined, couldn't have [be]en sufficiently patriotic to deserve [th]e honor proposed. Senator Ev[ar]t's advocated the resolution, de[cl]aring that "but for Captain Reid [th]e battle would not have been [f]ought, but for him the victory [w]ould not have been won." Sena[to]r's Plumb and Pratt objected on the ground that it would set a pre[c]edent that would be followed by a multitude of cases. A standing vote resulted in 12 yeas, 36 nays. No quorum voting it was laid over retaining its place on the calendar.

The committee of the House on the judiciary in reporting the anti trust bill says that no system of laws can be devised by Congress which could effectually protect the people against the evils and oppressions of trusts and monopolies. That whatever Congress may enact on this subject will be of little value unless supplemented by legislation in the states, but concludes with the statement that it can do no better than it has done under the circumstances.

The ministers plenipotentiary of nine of the American Republics have signed the treaty of arbitration for reference to their respective governments. Three more signatures are expected soon, and it is expected that all the powers will sign the treaty during the Summer and Autumn.

Senator Blackburn has introduced a bill to admit Arizona Territory into the Union.

On May 13th Senator Call will address the Senate on the joint resolution, heretofore offered by him, as to opening negotiations with Spain to allow Cuba to establish a Republic.

Senator Cullom has introduced a bill to compel railroad companies to use automatic couplers on all freight cars.

Mr. Ingalls has introduced a bill granting a pension of $8 per month to all soldiers who served in the late war 3 months and less than one year; $8 per month to those who served one year and not exceeding [illegible] days and one cent per diem for those who served more than [illegible] days. No person who is worth $[illegible] can avail himself of this act. [illegible]

The committee appointed by the Republican Senate caucus to frame a compromise silver measure have been unable to reach a conclusion. Senator Teller introduced a bill in the Senate providing for free coinage and urged very strongly his objections to the feature of the House silver bill which makes it possible for the Secretary of the Treasury on demand to give silver bullion in exchange for certificates issued on bullion. Senator Sherman insisted that, that provision should be retained. A good many members of the House feel impatient on account of the uncertain attitude of the majority of the Senate in regard to silver legislation. This feeling has found expression among representatives of both parties to the effect that if the Senate should not choose to agree on the bill formulated by the Republican joint caucus committee there would probably be no silver legislation whatever this session.

Senator Reagon has introduced a bill to abolish the retired lists of the army, navy and judiciary. It is not expected to become a law, but it has occasioned no little uneasiness among the retired officers. They fear that with public attention directed to the large amount expended for this class of pensioners, and the abuse of the retirement laws, an atempt will be made at weeding out which will result in loss of pay to the deserving as well as to those who have no just claims.

ORDER OF PUBLICATION.

At rules held in the Circuit Court Clerk's office of Pocahontas County, west Virginia, on the first Monday in May 1890.

Mary E. Piles
vs. — In Ch'nc'ry.
George C. McGlaughlin.

The object of this suit is to collect a claim of the plaintiff Mary E. Piles, against the defendant George C. McGlaughlin, for Sixty Dollars, with interest thereon from November 8th, 1889, by subjecting to the payment thereof and costs of this suit so much as may be necessary of a tract of about 175 acres of land lying in Pocahontas Co., W. Va. near Green Bank, conveyed to said George C. McGlaughlin by J. C. Arbogast and wife, and upon which an attachment is issued in this suit has been levied to secure such payment.

And it appearing by affidavit filed that the defendant George C. McGlaughlin is a non-resident of the State of west Va., it is ordered that he do appear here within one month after the date of the first publication of this order, and do what is necessary to protect his interest in this suit.

Commissioner's Sale of Land.

Pursuant to a decree of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, West Virginia rendered on the 8th day of April 1890, in the Chancery Cause of Jacob Piles vs. John Piles and others, I as special Commissioner shall proceed to sell at public auction to the highest bidder, in front of the Court House of said Pocahontas County on the

16TH DAY OF JUNE, 1890,

2 tracts of land, one containing 61 acres more less, lying on the waters of Beaver Lick creek; the other containing 200 acres, more or less, adjoining the first mentioned tract, lying on Stephenson's Ridge, South East side of Greenbrier River, in said Pocahontas County West Virginia. A portion of this land has been heretofore held by Isaac Dean, Josiah Sims and others, but it is all subject to the liens of legacies and judgments reported and decreed in this cause.

The unaliened lands will be first sold, and then that aliened in the inverse order of alienation.

The title to this land is clear; a portion of it is well timbered; it lies well and is considered valuable farming and grazing land.

TERMS OF SALE:

So much cash in hand as will pay costs of suit and expenses of sale. On the balance, a credit of Six, Twelve and Eighteen months will be given, the purchaser executing bond with good security, bearing interest from day of sale, and a lien will be retained as ultimate security.

H. S. RUCKER, Sp'cl Com'r.

$10,000 Fire At Ronceverte.

The upper lumber mill of the St. Lawrence Manufacturing Co. at Ronceverte, Greenbrier county, accidentally caught fire about 10:30 o'clock on Monday morning last, April 18th and in a short while was completely destroyed, together with some lumber. The buildings were frame and very dry, and burned furiously, all efforts to save them being unavailing. The loss is reported to be $10,000, upon which there was $6,000, insurance.

Terrible Railroad Accident at Staunton.

At 3A. M., on Monday, April 28th the express train of the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad, for Washington, was descending the heavy grade a mile west of Staunton when the brake rod of the engine fell, and the air brake was rendered useless, and the wild train rushed into Staunton at eighty miles an hour, tearing away the depot roof. The Pullman sleeper left the track and was thrown on its side. In it were fifteen members of the Pearl of Pekin troupe en route to Baltimore, announced to play there the next night. Of the company, Miss Myrtle Knott injured, died while being taken from the car. Miss Edith Miller, leg broken; Mrs. Edward Webb, Edward Slevens, Miss Bertha Fisher, Louis Harrison and Miss Lonie Dunham all escaped with slight cuts and bruises. W. F. Kilpatrick, lumber merchant, New York, leg severely torn; L. M. Sloman, commercial traveller Cincinnatti, bruised. The car took fire, but was put out by citizens.

A Coming Motor.

"Ten years from now you will not see so many horses in Chicago," said Charles Herold, who registered from Germany at the Grand Pacific.

"A firm in Munich is making carriages to be propelled by gas generated from benzine. Several of the new vehicles are in successful operation, and the company is securing patents in all the big nations of the world. I rode in one of the carriages only two months ago. On the country roads we went at the rate of ten miles an hour, but in the crowded streets we moved about as slowly as a horse car. The motor is placed in the rear over the main axle, and the benzine is carried in a receptacle under the seat. It holds enough for a trip of eighty miles.

The gas mixture is ignited in a cylinder by an eclectric spark. The motor is started by simply turning a lever. A link chain belted to a wheel on the rear axle applies the power. In its make-up the carriage is something like a tricycle, having only three wheels, and it is guided precisely the same way. It is easy to increase or diminish the speed, and the carriage can be stopped in a moment. The system can be applied to small or large vehicles. The cost is comparatively low."

Ben. Elsey, a colored man, who was hanged at Birmingham, Ala., last Friday for killing a peddler, was probably the most hardened wretch who ever lived. By his confession he had been implicated in the killing of 21 people, eighteen men and three women—nineteen of these white and two colored. He said he had been a thief, murderer and gambler from the time he was 14 years of age, and could not say how many robberies he had committed.

Rhode Island, for the first time in her history, is in the hands of the Democrats. The election by the people having failed in that neither candidate recieved a majority of the votes cast, it was thrown into the Legislature, where by the second election, the Democrats have a majority of two on joint ballot. This will give the Democrats all the State officers.

Geo. Denson, a merchant at Randolph, Ala., declared Sunday night that he would die suddenly at 4 o'clock on Monday afternoon. On Monday moring he slected a coffin, made his will and gathering his family and friends about him, spent the day in prayer. At 4 o'clock he seated himself in a rocking chair, and in three minutes was dead. The doctors say death was caused by heart disease, brought on by mental and nervous excitement. Denson was about 40 years old and apparently in excellent health.

Curing Bow Legs.

Mrs. Bassett had twins, three-year old boys, who were bow legged. She consulted a doctor and asked if she must put their legs in irons.

"Irons!" shouted the doctor. "Fiddlesticks! Take off their shoes and stockings. Their muscles have probably been cramped and weakened already and irons will only increase the trouble. Off with their shoes."

Another suggestion of the doctor was to let the boys walk up hill, and when they could not be out of doors to have an inclined plane arranged in the house for them to practice on. In the effort to walk up a steep incline one naturally throws the feet outward. After some months' treatment of this sort the boys' legs straightened and their muscles grew strong. It was learned by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children that a baby girl just beginning to walk was toddling around in her little bare feet, and a committee visited the mother.

"But does your baby actually go barefoot, too?" asked one of the visitors.

"Yes. She has never worn a shoe in her life. When she goes out for an airing she wears warm woolen socks, for until she can walk she cannot of course, take sufficient exercise to keep her feet warm. But in the house she is as bare-footed as the boys. She is just beginning to get on her feet, and her little bare toes are almost as useful to her as fingers. They have saved her many a fall.

One of the members of the committee was the wife of a shoe dealer; she sat aghast. "But do you never intend to have your children wear shoes?" she asked.

"Oh, yes, when I feel quite sure that the muscles of their feet and ankles are strong enough to endure them, but the moment they begin to indulge in that hateful abomination of toeing in, off they come again until the difficulty is remedied."

The society decided not to interfere, and the campaign against bow leggedness continues.

A strapping big fellow, who wore only a shirt, trousers and a pair of Government shoes, was called on to read. He got along very well, until he reached the word "biped." Here a gentleman in the audience interrupted, when the following dialogue occurred:

"My man, what is the meaning of the word biped?"

"A biped is a beast."

"Why is a beast a biped?"

"Because it has four feet."

"Are you a biped?"

"No, sir."

"Why?"

"Because I hasn't got four feet."

"What are you then?"

"I'se a suped!"

The shout of laughter which greeted this sally broke up the exhibition.

"But you could give him a good talking to," urged Jones.

"No use, dear boy; he never listens to anybody but an idiot."

"Perhaps," suggested Jones, with great modesty, "a few words from me might have the desired effect."

Teacher (to new scholar)—"What is your name, sonny?" Boy—"Gunn." "Give me your full name." "John G. Gunn." "What is the G. for?" "Get yer." "What do you mean by that?" "Well, all the boys call me Johnny Get yer Gunn anyhow."

A MIDNIGHT ESCAPE.

A Story of the French Revolution.

At the Castle of R——, about three leagues from Bordeaux, at 6 in the evening of the 29th of October, 1792, a young lady and a child about 8 years old were assembled in a low room, lighted by small and barred windows. The elder persons were full of painful thoughts; but the child made his shouts heard, which were repeated by the echoes through the corridors of the castle. Trunks and packages were strewn about the room. Count R—— frequently showed movements of impatience and anxiety as he turned his eyes upon his wife and son. His agitation betrayed the fears of his heart.

"William is a long time before he returns," he said, rising from his seat; "has the scheme failed? Had he betrayed me? Oh God! save my wife and son!"

"My dear," said the lady, gently, "cease to worry yourself; Jaques, the footman, is an honest fellow."

"Yes; he is a Republican," replied the Count.

"Still he is an honest man," replied the lady.

"But William ought to remember that we are impatient to see him back again. I feel very much inclined to go as far as the village."

"Do not go out!" exclaimed Mme. de R——, throwing herself on her husbands neck; "do not go out, I implore you."

"I am armed," said the Count.

"Wait only a few minutes. William cannot be long."

The Count sat down again. His son Edward, who had been playing about the room, now climbed up on his knees. He took him in his arms, kissed his forehead, and then appeared calmer.

Half an hour had passed away in sad silence, when two gentle knocks at the door announced William's return. He was followed by a man who carried a bulky packet under his arm.

"Monsieur de Comte," said William, "here is Jacques. All is arranged; we must start."

"You are very late my friend," replied the Count.

"Because I could not get out of that wretched public house until I had drunk to the health of the republic, for I must pass as a patriot, as a citizen, and I don't know what else beside."

"It is true, M. le Comte," said Jacques; "but here we are at last. I bring you the clothes which you must put on at once. You must disguise yourself as a sailor—it is the safest thing to do. And for you, Madame, here are caps and petticoats of my wife's and a cabin boy's dress for M. Edward. All this is necessary, otherwise there are no means of saving you."

"Brave man!" said the Count, pressing his hand with an emotion which he could not conceal.

"Listen, M. le Comte: I am only a simple sailor, owner of the boat which my late father left me. It is three years since that terrible northwest gale stripped me of all I possessed, but it was you who set me afloat again. Do you think that we are folk who don't remember all that?" No, no, by the faith of a sailor; and it is with our hearts that we are going to brave the sentinels coast guards for you, and put you on board an English ship, or land you in Spain or Jersey. My boat is provisioned for a fortnight."

"Here is my purse," said the Count; "take it."

"I have no need of it," said Jacques. "Keep it, you will want it in a foreign land. Before long it will be midnight; then it will be high tide; then you must go one, by one, to the shore at Martinet. If you went altogether it would arouse suspicion; and we have a bad lot in the village who can't sleep. I know very well why—the wicked never sleep."

The Count R—— had given proofs of his courage and his love for his royal family, both at Paris and at Versailles. He was one of those brave men who exposed themselves to death on the 10th of August rather than to allow the Queen's apartments to be profaned by a furious mob.

The Count had retired to his castle, with the hope of living there unnoticed among the peasants who loved him.

One morning he saw a stranger mounted on a fine horse, covered with dust and foam, enter the castle courtyard; the man gave him a note and at once departed. Count R——, astonished, opened the note and read the words: "Fly, Monsieur le Compte, your life is threatened, The Representative has just ordered your arrest; you have not a moment to lose. Fly! it is a friend who implores you to do so. This evening it will be too late." When he read this note the Count thought it might be a snare which was laid for him; he resolved to remain at home rather than seperate himself from his wife and son. However he informed the Countess of the message, who less confident than her husband, with tears in her eyes, implored him to go. It was then decided that they should, all start together. But how were they to fly? They were still deliberating when William, the Count's man of business, was announced. This man was young he had been brought up at the castle. He was a peasant who had received the usual education of his class, but who concealed under a coarse exterior and rough clothes a quick penetration.

Count R——, therefore, at once told him his fears, and informed him of the letter which he had just received from Bordeaux. William perceived the necessity for a prompt departure.

He prepared a plan which was accepted.

"Do not trouble yourself, Monsieur le Comte," he said. "I will intrust you to to the hands of a man who will know how to lead you to safety, so you have nothing to be anxious about."

William went to see his cousin Jacques, the owner of a boat. All was soon arranged between them. them. The Count and his family were to be landed in Spain or Jersey, or taken on board the English fleet, which for some days had been in sight of Corduan. Jacques was one of those old sea wolves of which many are to be found at the mouths of rivers. Entirely occupied by his arduous calling, he troubled himself very little about the various forms of government which for the last three years had succeeded each other. All he cared for was to be able to govern his own bark; and if he had any difficulty it was only when the sea was rough, and the winds prevented him from affording help to vessels in danger. Formerly he had distinguished himself by his courage on board the squadron of the Comte de Grasse. He was honest, upright and kind hearted. When his cousin proposed to him the perilous mission of rescuing the Count from the plots of his enemies, it was with the greatest enthusiasm that he accepted it. A squeeze of William's hand was the pledge of his determination.

Midnight had just sounded from the castle clock. The Count started. William's presence prevented a scene which might have deprived the fugitives of that strength and energy of which they then stood so greatly in need.

After a debate, full of the most devoted love, it was decided that Mme. R—— and her son should go on first, and then the Count should follow them in a few minutes.

Rather more than five minutes had elapsed since Mme. R—— had left under the escort of Jacques and one of his men, when the bell of the outer gate of the castle rang violently. William left the Count, and went out by a secret door to examine who their late visitors might be. It was not long before he perceived that they were men armed with sticks swords and guns, who ordered the porter in the name of the law to open the gate and to deliver up to them the keys of the castle. The porter, who was in William's confidence, parleyed with them as long as he could and did not yield up the keys till he saw that all resistance was impossible. The haste which the chief of the band made to reach the Count's apartments, counting as he said, in a loud voice, to find the hair in his hole, proved that he was well acquainted with the castle.

During this time M. de R—— and William were on their way to the shore by cross roads. Twenty times they risked their lives, but what was the despair of M. de R—— when at last they arrived to find neither the boat nor his wife nor Jacques!

"You have betrayed me, William!" he said, seizing his arm.

"No, Monsieur le Comte," replied William, firmly.

At the same instant a man came out of a ditch and approached them slowly. Count R—— advanced to meet him, a pistol in his hand; and when he was near enough to recognize him he saw that it was Jacques.

"What have you done with my wife and child?" he said in a voice trembling with emotion.

"Silence!" said Jacques, putting his finger to his mouth. "Silence, Monsieur Le Comte! or you are lost. They are in safety. You must follow me." After an hour's walk they arrived at the banks of a very high rock. Jacques, making a trumpet with his hands, hailed a bark, which the morning fog prevented them from perceiving. They did not wait long for an answer.

"William," said Jacques, "return to the castle and watch over the corn and stores. Those rogues have come as far as Martinet, and we've narrowly escaped being caught by them. They have gone on further, and they may find us here yet."

"Farwell, Monsieur le Comte! courage and confidence," said William; "we will take good care of all in the castle."

The Count pressed his hand affectionately, "Farewell," he said to him in a choking voice.

Three minutes had not elapsed since William had left the Count and Jacques when he returned, running and making signs which were only too well understood by the fugitives. "Embark!" cried William, "here they are!" but the boat had not yet touched the shore; they heard the oars beating the water with hurried strokes; on the other side they perceived armed men, who were pursuing them, running, who evidently saw them. It was all over with them. "There is only one means of safety," said Jacques; "follow me." Both rushed into the water, the sailors in the boat redoubled their efforts, and in less than a minute they arrived to aid the fugitives. The wretches who pursued them, furious at not having been able to capture them, raised savage cries and terrible threats. One of them, who appeared more exasperated than his comrades, and who was armed with a gun, took aim at the fugitives; he fired, and a ball struck Jacques in the leg. The unfortunate man fell to the bottom of the boat. "It is nothing," said Jacques, as he got up again.

In the evening, when they passed near the cutter stationed at the mouth of the river, they were hailed; but they were able to answer in a satisfactory manner. They cruised about till the morrow, hoping to meet an English vessel. At early dawn they saw a sail coming straight to them; it was an English frigate. Jacques steered toward it, and soon he had the happiness of putting on board the Count and his family, who were conveyed safely to England.

Count R—— profited by the first law in favor of emigrants to return to France. His property had, indeed, been sold, but he knew that his steward William, had become the purcaser of it to preserve it for him. An unknown hand had supplied him with the means of paying a higher price than that offered by the count's enemies. This friendly hand was the same which a week before had written the note urging the count's departure; this hand was that of a man who could not forget that Count R——, by lending him a lage sum of money, had rescued him from the infamy of a convict's life.

When Count R—— returned to his castle he was welcomed with the greatest joy. He threw himself on William's neck and embraced him as a brother.

"And Jacques?" he asked immediately, "where is Jacques?"

"Here he is, Monsieur le Comte," replied William, pointing to a man who out of respect, was keeping in the background; and this man had a wooded leg.

"Ah!" cried the Count, "then you are my brave fellow, who saved us! But your are wounded! How did that come about?"

"Oh, it is nothing; it does not hinder me from working."

"But in what battle did you lose your leg?"

"In a battle in which the combatants were not very numerous, but which was not without glory. Do you remember, Monsieur le Comte, the shot which fell on the boat?"

The Count embraced the old sailor with tears in his eyes.

The Count, William and Jacques henceforth dwelt together in the Chateau of R——; and in winter evenings they often related to their children the adventures of the night of October 29, 1792.

"Your face is familar, but I can't place you," said the street-car conductor, as he sp ed a plugged quarter among his change.

"Mudge—"I believe you told me a couple of weeks ago that you were going to try making love to your land-lady's daughter, so that the old lady would be a little easier on you. Did it work?"

Yabsley—"Work! I should say not! I played it so well that the old woman thought I was hopelessly infatuated, and tried to raise the price of my board on the strength of it."

The Singer Sewing machine factory at Elizabethport, N. J., was damaged to the extent of $200,000,000, on the 6th inst., by fire.

The disaster at the Provincial Insane Asylum, 10 miles from Montreal the 6th inst., was a most deplorable affair. At least 50 lunatics were burnt to death, and the number may be more. Seven nuns are also supposed to have lost their lives.

A remarkable elopement is reported from Jackson County. Miss Delia Lyon, a well-known school teacher, eloped with and was married to one of her pupils, Tommy Murray. The bridegroom is just 16 years old, while the blushing bride confesses that she has seen 30 summers. Young Murray is the son of a well-known minister. Mrs. Murray says she will continue school teaching.

A Parkersburg dispatch says: Ex Senator Camden, Ex Senator Davis and Stephen B. Elkins have conveyed to the West Virginia and Pittsburgh Railroad 86 500 acres in Webster county, rich in timber and coal, for $246,125, which were purchased a short time ago for $71,400 An iron mining company with a capital of $400,000, has just purchased 9,300 acres for $150,000 in Greenbrier county, which is richly underlaid with minerals. Two thousand acres near this city, rich in timber, were sold Tuesday for $50-000.

The Paris edition of the New York Herald quotes Dr. Brown Sequard as maintaining that to cut one's head off is an almost painless operation. You begin with your throat and as soon as you have cut a little way into the windpipe all pain ceases, and you can go on and cut through the whole neck, with the exception of the spine, without being made uncomfortable. The painless part of the process seems to be overlooked by those persons who make their exit from this world by severing their windpipe. They usually stop when that is done, and then expire, without enjoying the rest of the process, the painless and comfortable part. Suicides by the throat cutting operation should bear this in mind and cut off the head entirely, thus seeing the whole show for the price of a single ticket.

WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9th.—The Republicans of the House held a caucus Tuesday in which they experienced how vexatious Speaker Reed's arbitrary rulings are when applied at home. The caucus met to decide upon the order of business. The River and Harbor managers tried hard to have that appropriation bill disposed of the first thing, but Mr. Reed had determined that the tariff should have precedence. Then they wanted second consideration, but were denied that, or any time definite and were extremely exasperated. The time to be taken up by tariff talk was discussed. Speaker Reed suggested that general debate be omitted and the bill taken up in detail at once. He knew the bill would pass and there wasn't any use of much talking. Mr. McKinley jumped to his feet and protested vehemently against the insinuation that no debate was necessary. He declared that the party need not fear to discuss the bill before the country; that to cut off general debate would be an outrage upon both minority and majority. Mr. Burrows created amusement by saying that some people having made a tariff speech thought the subject exhausted for all time to come, and were naturally impatient at hearing other people talk. (This was a drive at Mr. Reed's tariff speech two years ago.) The Speaker then laid down his ultimatum—There would be fifty more working days this session and the majority could give the whole time to the tariff if it would, but it must be understood that other legislation suffered as 'twas very necessary to adjourn early. He probably meant public buildings and other little jobs so important to candidates for re election. The outcome of it all was a compromise that the bill should pass the House and be in the Senate in a fortnight.

Importers of all kinds that put up their money for the high tariff candidate have discovered their mistakes and are daily harrassing the Ways and Means Committee for favors and relief. The manufacturers of sugar made from imported molasses, now insist upon a bounty. But out west the light of reason is finally dawning upon the people. The leading republican paper in Minnesota, the St. Paul Pioneer Press, says, that if the McKinley tariff bill passes, that state will go democratic; that all the farmer's necessaries are grevioudsly taxed and that he is given no corresponding relief. The session will be a long one. The republicans have full power to enact any measure they want and are not likely to leave until the approach of the congressional elections this fall warns them to go home and correct the ideas the farmers are getting that the tariff is a heavy tax.

The Senate republican committee has abandoned all hope of reaching a satisfactory solution of the silver question. The whole matter will therefore have to be determined on the floor of the Senate. An influential member of the Finance committee said that if they desired it, the free coinage people could pass their measure as the majority of the Senate was in favor of it. But that the President had intimated that he wouldn't approve a free coinage bill and the doubt in the minds of the extreme silver men was whether they should go ahead in spite of this intimation, or whether they should agree to some compromise that would obtain the President's signature.

Before the committee of the whole House in discussing the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill Mr. McCreary, of Kentucky, condemned the administration for being opposed to reciprocity with the South American states and for keeping the proceedings of the Pan-American Congress as quiet as a Star-Chamber. The McKinley tariff bill, he said, cut off reciprocity with Canada, as well.

The blunders and mistakes of those having the Pan-American Congress in charge had delayed and retarded its success. It was a mistake to appoint all the U. S. Delegates from those who were in sympathy with the present administration, and not in sympathy with more than half of the people. It was a mistake not to appoint one delegate who was identified with the southern states. It was a mistake that the delegates were not sent south, but he feared that was a premeditated blunder. This bill has been passed in the House.

Kee Nee, a Chinaman of high rank has arrived in Washington to enter the diplomatic service of his government. In speaking of the exclusion of his countrymen from this country, he said that he could not conscientiously condemn the measure, for the reason that ninety per cent. of the emigrants are the worst vagabonds of the nation, an element of which his home government would gladly be rid. "Did our respected citizens come over here however," he said, "such a law would not have been necessary."

Disappearance of the "Black Hole."

There was on the farm of Alex. H. Sitlington, near the Big Spring in this county, a well or pool of water, the depth of which was never ascertained, by the oldest inhabitants or their ancesters, though many efforts were made so to do. It was about fifty feet in circumference and the water perfectly black in appearance, though quite clear when taken out. Hence it was called the "Black Hole." It was located on a flat piece of ground at the foot of Middle mountain. The water stood about two feet from the surface, and was never known to get higher or lower. Around it was a favorite place for cattle to lay down, and although water was scarce in that immediate locality, and the hole never fenced or otherwise enclosed, stock were never known to approach it to drink. It is located but a short distance from the public road, and strangers, who had seen an account of it, in Howes' History of Va., or heard of it from other sources, often stopped in the road, and visited this pool of water.

A few days ago, Wm. A. Varner, who lives on the farm, was passing by to salt his cattle, and discovered that the earth had fallen in around it, the water all gone, the Hole filled up to within about 15 or 20 feet of the top and so dry, that the earth at the bottom was cracked.

On the [illegible] [illegible], a few hundred yards from the Hole is a perpendicular cavern, and persons who have dropped rocks therein, have imaged that they could hear the rocks fall in water at a very great distance, and the theory is, that by reason of the quantity of rain that has fallen in the last year, that a vein of water from this cavern, had found its way to the Black Hole, passing through the same, and this belief is sustained by the fact that two wet weather springs, that come out about one mile south, ran muddy water one whole day, a few days before Mr. Varner's discovery, while all other streams were perfectly clear.

Split Rock Briefs.

Not seeing anything in your paper from this part of the Co., for some time, I will give you a few items.

The weather has been wet and cold, mixed with snow by intervals, for some time past.

Corn planting is later than usual, on account of bad weather.

The lumber business has got to be an important matter in this section.

Wooddell's saw mill is doing good work.

Jas. Gibson, Jr., has moved his large engine near here and will be employed sawing cherry lumber for the rest of the season.

Mr. Brown will start twenty four horse teams in the near future, hauling cherry lumber from here to Elkin's.

Miss Bella Clark, is teaching a subscription school here with a good attendance. Why not more of these kind of schools in the Co?

The sick in this immediate vicinity are on the mend. A few cases of whoopingcough, mumps and Grippe.

Woods McGlaughlin expects to move to Elkin's soon.

Some fishermen of Baltimore succeeded in catching a fine lot of trout, and returned home rejoicing. Why don't the farmers have their land posted to prevent foreigners from destroying all the fish?

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever," but if Harrison's administration continues this hard to the end, there certainly will be great rejoicing when it closed.

Success to THE TIMES.

THE LATE REV. JAS. E. MOORE.

The following memorial notice we clip from the Episcopal Methodist, and publish by special request:

DEAR BRO. BOYLE:

Since my return from Conference, it has been my sad duty to bury two of my old parishioners, Rev. Jas. E. Moore and Mrs. Caroline Scales, both of Marvin Chapel congregation Levelton circuit, Lewisburg District.

Bro. Moore was born in Pocahontas co., W. Va., May 26, 1811, and died at his residence, Mill Point, same county, March 26, 1890, in the 79th year of his age. He was converted September 17, 1831, at a campmeeting held near Hillsboro, same county, under the ministry of Rev. Mr. Spriggs. He was licensed to preach by the Quarterly Conference of the Huntersville circuit, November 4, 1837; was ordained local deacon in Baltimore by Bishop Waugh, and ordained local elder March 7, 1869, by Bishop Wightman. He was a local preacher of the highest type, consecrate to that part of the work which God and his Church called him. He was abundant in labors and liberal in his support of Christ's cause. His secular duties never seemed to hinder him from attending to the wants of the Church. He married and buried more people, baptized more children, and was instrumental in the conversion of more souls, than any other preacher that ever lived in his county. All classes loved and praised him. He was very sick when I left for Conference, and afterwards expressed a desire to live until my return that he might hear from the brethren. This privilege was denied him, but he went up to join that host of preachers who had crossed the flood, and are resting under the shade of the "Tree of Life." A large family mourn his loss.—Among them are the wives of Revs, R. M. Wheeler and W. M. Ballengee of our Conference. His end was peace. He has taken his crown. On a spot of ground where Bishop Asbury once stood, and it is said once held a Conference, we buried him to await the resurrection morn."

IN THE DARK
or
A Fearful Fright.

We were just getting ready for dinner when a Mexican ran excitedly into camp and announced with trembling lips that old Diavolo, the man-eating lion, was on the ranpage again. He had killed a sheep herder only last night, and the Mexican assured us that he had struck our trail, and might descend on the camp at any moment.

Our party consisted of Ben Sutro, a grizzled forty-niner; Lieutenant Mason, a young West Pointer; Pedro, the cook; and Bob Mason and myself, two newspaper men writing up the West.

The Mexican's story had excited the party so much that they could hardly finish their meal, and old Sutro was in favor of going in search of the lion and kill him before he had a chance to try the same game on us.

Having ridden sixty miles that day and feeling rheumatic, I did not ask to join the party, but offered to keep house while they were away.

It was in early fall, yet the night air was chilly; so I heaped more fuel upon the fire, and set the coffee pot where it would keep hot until the return of the hunters; for I knew they would relish a draught of the cheering beverage after their tramp.

Then, using my saddle for a pillow, I rolled myself in my blankets, and lay down with my feet to the fire.

The stars were shining brightly, and I lay for a long time gazing at the tiny worlds above me, and listening to the croaking of the frogs.

I did not intend to go to sleep but gradually my senses left me and I was in the land of dreams.

I had slept some time—when I was awakened by a sharp pain in my left arm, and at the same was aware that I was being turned over.

My natural impulse was to yell and spring to my feet, but something restrained me. -ad I moved I should not be here to tell this tale.

I immediately got possession of my faculties, and although wrapped head and ears in my blankets, I distinctly heard a purring sound, as though a great cat was standing over me. The memory of Jose's encounter with the lion flashed upon me.

The next instant all doubt was removed, for the sharp claws again pierced my side, and I was rolled over like a log. I dare not cry out for help, for I knew that the slightest movement, the least sign of life, would be instant death. Oh, what agony I suffered in those brief moments.

Perspiration started from every pore in my body. My heart stood still. I was frozen with horror. Each instant I expected to feel the cruel fangs fasten upon my throat. The muzzle of the brute pressed me as he snuffed at the blanket. It seemed as if whole hours were being consumed.

What was I to do? If my comrades did not return the lion was sure to tire of toying with the inanimate roll of blankets, and tear them into shreds. Already my side was frightfully mangled by the sharp claws, and I suffered dreadfully.

One's senses are sharpened by peril. I revolved a dozen schemes in my head while I lay upon my face, scarcely daring to breathe.

Suddenly a desperate ruse suggested itself. The pond, deep and black, lay but a few feet from the fire, which now must be dead, or the lion would never have approached. The bank sheveled to the water's edge. It was a life-or-death risk, but I determined to attempt to roll into the water.

Once in the deep water of the lake I knew I should be safe, for all the cat tribe are afraid of wetting their feet.

But how to escape these terrible claws. At the first movement the lion would be upon me with a bound.

Ha! I had my revolver in its holster at my side, and my hand was near it.

Slowly, with an imperceptable motion, I slipped my hand around until I grasped the hilt. I dared not draw the weapon. It was a self cocking revolver, and I knew that if I could fire it the report would so startle the beast that I might roll into the lake before he recovered from his panic. At any rate, I would make the attempt.

My finger was upon the trigger, and I felt it yield just as the ponderous paw again landed upon my side directly over the holster.

There was not an instant to lose.

With a jerk I threw the muzzle of the weapon still in the holster, as nearly as I could in a line with where I judged the beast's body to be, and pulled.

There was a sharp report, and a terrific scream, that froze the marrow in my bones, but I retained sufficient sense to roll over and over, and fall plump into the lake.

I sank down, and down, like an animated crowbar. The water was like ice, and I was confronted by a new peril; for the blankets were wrapped so tightly around me that I could not free myself readily.

But I struggled desperately, and succeeded in lowering my arms. As I came gasping to the surface I heard two gunshots in quick succession, and several shouts.

I knew that my comrades had returned, and had just strength enough to paddle to the shore and drag myself out upon the bank.

When I regained consciousness I was lying upon a couch of blankets, surrounded by the boys, and the colonel was holding a flask to my lips.

"It's all right, old man," said Sutro. "You had a pretty close call, all along of that infernal Pedro. We missed the lion and he got between us and the camp on the trail.

"We heard the shot as we were returning, and a minute afterward something came bounding down the trail like all get out. I let it have both barrels of slugs, and it fell at my feet in a heap. It was old Diavolo, sure enough, and the biggest lion I ever set eyes on. He will measure ten feet from tip to tip and must weight five hundred pounds."

I grasped Ben's hand gratefully, and then shook hands with each of the other fellows.

Hearing a groan, I turned my eyes in that direction, and saw the wretched Mexican lying upon the ground.

"Oh! he'll do," said Sutro, answering my unformed question. "Only a couple of ribs and a shaking up. We will send him back to San Jose with Jose tomorrow."

The fire was blazing again, and Jose was busily engaged in preparing a decoction of bruised aromatic leaves, with which he speedily bound up my wounds. The Mexicans and California Indians are skillful with herbs, and Jose's poultices gave me instant relief.

We examined the carcass of the old lion on the following morning, and found it pretty well riddled with the colonel's slugs. There were a dozen scars of bullets the old fellow had carried away with him in former years, and in the fore paw we found the bullet from my revolver.

As I write this account of the most thrilling event of my life, my feet rest upon old Diavolo's pelt stretched out in front of my fireplace. We are old friends now.

Mother—"Oh, doctor! My darling boy has swallowed a needle. What shall I do?" Doctor—"Do not be alarmed, madam, He will soon have a stitch in his side. We can then locate the needle, and extract it."

JOHN'S CHOICE.

BY HELEN FORREST GRAVES.

"Engaged, eh?" said John Jaggett. "Well, I never looked at it in exactly that light before!"

"We've all took it for granted," said Mrs. Jaggett, pursing her thin lips and knitting away very fast.

"Does she think so, mother?"

"What else can she think, John?"

"I never asked her to marry me, mother."

"There's other ways of proposing to girls, John, except askin' 'em to marry you in so many words," said the old lady.

John Jaggett gave his thick, brown moustache a resentful tug.

"I'm blessed if I know what they are, mother," said he.

"Everybody has took it for granted, John," repeated his mother, severely. "And Melinda is a capital housekeeper—just the girl I'd like to see in charge of things here, now that I'm getting old and feeble."

John Jaggett put his hand caressingly on his mother's shoulder.

"Why, mother," said he, "don't talk that way. So far as I can see! you're as young and spry as you ever were."

Mrs. Jaggett shook her head, mournfully.

"No, I ain't John," said she. "When a woman gets to be sixty old, she begins to fail in spite of everything—and rheumatism always run in my side of the family. If I could only see you married and settled down before the Lord sees fit to call me away."

John whistled.

"Time enough, mother," said he—"quite time enough."

"I don't know about that, John. You were thirty yesterday!" urged Mrs. Jaggett.

"How the dear old mother remembers things!" said he, laughing. "And Melinda Butts is three and thirty."

"A year or two don't make no great odds, John."

"Well, perhaps it don't," he assented.

"John," cried the woman, as her son took up his hat, "where are you going?"

"I'm going to New York for a day or two, to see about that new hay-cutter, mother before the grass gets too high," answered he.

"To-day, John?"

"Yes, to-day. Why not?"

"Go over and see Melinda first, John. Get something settled," pleaded Mrs. Jaggett.

store for his mother and finally stopped at a little millinery store, kept by a former Skull Mountain neighbor.

"I want to get mother a lace cap or a worsted shoulder-cape, or something," thought he.

But the store was full of strange faces, and a new name gleamed, in newly-painted letters, on the sign above the door.

Hello!" said Jaggett. "What's the matter?"

"Mrs. Mixsell was buried last month," said the new incumbent a stout widow with a row of artificial auburn curls which did not in the least match her black hair. "And poor Alice is crying her eyes out in the back room. P'r'aps you know some of her friends? It don't stand to reason as I can keep her here, with three daughters of my own. And you know—"

"Oh, Mr. Jaggett, uttered a soft appealing voice from the stuffy, half lighted little apartment beyond "is that you? Oh, poor mother has died and left me, and I don't know what to do!"

Alice Mixsell was a fair haired, mountain daisy complexioned girl of seventeen. Her blue eyes, drenched in tears, looked piteously up to John Jaggett—her coral lip trembled. They were old acquaintances, and he had always admired her. Nay, once or twice, when he had been staying in the city, he had taken her to a theatre matinee or a picture gallery. As he looked at her, sweet, helpless loveliness, a great wave of protecting tenderness swept over his whole nature.

"Alice," said he, "my darling! Sweet Alice, dry your tears. Henceforward you shall be my care. Get your bonnet and things! We'll go to the little parsonage around the corner and be married at once—and I'll take you back home with me!"

Alice drew back—her velvet blue eyes flashed.

"No!" said she. "You are saying this simply out of pity!"

"I'm saying it because I love you!" he cried, earnestly—and the deep light of his dark eyes corroborated his words.

Man is a creature of impulse, and John Jaggett's feelings had taken such complete possession of him, that it was not until Alice had become his wedded wife that he thought of Melinda, of the red hair and turkey-egg complexion.

"But it will all be right," he argued to himself. "Mother can't help liking dear little Alice. She and Mrs. Mixsell used to be good friends of B[illegible]ld days before the Mixsell ste[illegible] sold; and Alice will be a the sunbeam in the house—God a s[illegible]r!"

[illegible] company, I think, John," [illegible] her heart fluttering like [illegible] in its cage. "It's a carryall [illegible] trunk strapped on behind [illegible] tall, red-haired woman step[illegible] Oh, John, who can it [illegible]

[illegible] Jaggett changed color, as [illegible] the shrill, nasal accents [illegible] Melinda Butts!

[illegible]!" uttered that female. "I [illegible] I didn't reckon on 'get[illegible] married quite so sudden, Mrs. Jaggett; but after what you said to me, and neighbors' gossip and all, why, of course—"

John drew a long breath as he realized this new complication. His mother had proposed to Melinda Butts for him, as he had jestingly suggested, and here she was, bag and baggage, an embodied acceptance of the offer.

"Am I a Mormon in spite of myself?" he thought. "How, in the name of all the fates and furies, am I to get out of this tangle?"

"Sit still a minute, Allie," he said to his pretty young wife. "I'll go and tell them you're here."

"But if you've got company, John—"

"No company can be more honored than my wife, Allie," he said, gently, as he passed into the shady little parlor, where a scent of dried rose leaves came from the quaint old China jar on the mantle.

There stood a lank, spectacled, elderly man.

"Why, it's Lawyer Judd!" said John, starting back. "How do you do, Mr. Judd? May I ask what has procured us the honor of this visit?"

Lawyer Judd smiled and wriggled, and interwove his respectable-gloved fingers in each other, after a most embarassed fashion.

"How are you, Mr. Jaggett—how are you?" said he. "Well, to be candid with you, I came here with the young lady outside."

"You did?"

"Yes, I did," nodded the lawyer, who was one of those restless individuals who can never keep still a minute, but slipped and writhed and twisted himself about like a snake in black cassimere garments. "On—he, he, he!—a little question of matrimony."

John flushed to the roots of his wavy brown hair.

Was this to be a matter of breach of promise? Did they imagine for a second that he was to be coerced like this?

"Mr. Judd," said he, "there is some mistake here."

"I hope not, neighbor Jaggett," said the lawyer, more like the letter S than ever—"I hope not. Why should there be a mistake?"

"And," went on John, excitedly. "I don't propose to be bullied! I have never engaged myself to the young woman, nor have I given her any reason to believe—"

"No, no—no, to be sure not!" uttered the lawyer, swaying himself to and fro. "If I had supposed so, I should certainly never have married her."

"Married whom?" demanded John.

"Married Mrs. Elias Judd, to-be-sure—the late Miss Melinda Butts. This morning, Mr. Jaggett; and we're on our way to the Albany boat now, and my—ahem!—wife has stopped to bid your respected mother good-by as we came past. And really," glancing at a turnip-shaped silver watch which he carried in a fob pocket, "we have no time to spare. Melinda, my dear—"

He was amazed at the vehemence and cordiality with which John Jaggett wrung his hand.

"I congratulate you, my dear sir—congratulate you with all my heart!" said he. "Where is Mrs. Judd? Let me have the pleasure of expressing my good wishes to her also!"

And when the late Miss Melinda Butts" came in, rugged, hard featured and coarse, he thought of the little human rosebud waiting out by the keeping room window, and rejoiced inwardly.

All these occurrences took much less time in the happening than has been consumed in their relation; and when, finally, the dust of departure rolled after Mr. Judd's respectable carriage wheels, Mrs. Jaggett turned tearfully to her son.

"There, John," said she, "I told you how it would be! Melinda Butts is married and gone, and I havn't got no daughter-in-law, after all."

"Yes you have, mother," said John, his whole countenance growing radiant as he took her hand and led her into the room where Alice now sat, her innocent heart full of vague wonder and surmisings. "I was married to Alice Mixsell the day before yesterday."

Alice lifted her blue, wistful eyes to Mrs. Jaggett's amazed face.

"Mother died last month, said she. Will you be my mother now?"

Mrs. Jaggett clasped the girl to her heart.

"Yes dear, I will," she faltered. "Any one that John loves I'm going to love too. And we did need some woman about the house younger and smarter than I am. Kiss me, Alice! and now we'll have our tea. But, John, why didn't you tell me before?"

"Because I didn't know it myself, mother, said John Jaggett. "But I do think I've made a better bargain than Lawyer Judd; don't you?"

"Well," said Mrs. Jaggett, looking at Alice, "I—don't—know—but—that—you—have!"

MAN'S FLATTERY OF WOMAN.—I would advise young women not to depend for happiness upon the flatteries of men.—It is a poor compliment to your sex that so many men feel obliged in your presence to offer unmeaning compliments. Men capable of elegant and elaborate conversation elsewhere sometimes feel called upon at the door of the drawing-room to drop their common sense and to dole out sickening flatteries. They say things about your dress, and about your appearance that you know, and they know, are false. They say you are an angel. You know you are not. They tell you that "you are looking singularly beautiful this evening," when you know very well that the remark is only a commonplace one. Some men think that a conversation with a woman is interesting only as it is dotted and spiced with flatteries and meaningless compliments. Determined to tell the truth in office, and store, and shop, they consider it honorable to lie to a woman. The same thing that they told you on this side of the drawing-room, three minutes ago they said to some one on the other side of the drawing-room. Oh, let no one trample on your self respect. The meanest thing on which a woman can build her happiness is the flatteries of men.—Rev. T. De Witt Talmage in March Ladies Home Journal.

Justice (to student)—You are accused by Mr. Meyer, who lives across the street from your room, of insulting him.

In a fight with cowboys, twenty-five miles south of Oklahoma City, Ind. Ter., five men were killed, three fatally wounded and four slightly hurt.

The San Francisco Alta speaks of the Mississippi flood as "a waste water." To the dweller in a city where water costs more than flour, so prodigal a flow of the aquous fluid must look like great waste.

The Augusta Chronicle, (S. C.,) put these head lines over a dispatch announcing the lynching of a negro accused of an assault on a white girl: "An Outrage. A Horrible Murder in Lexington County, S. C." Comment unnecessary.

A novel way of raising money to build a church has been adopted by a congregation in an Iowa town. They borrowed $120,000 and gave life insurance on a number of members, which is to be applied on the debt as fast as death ensues.

The daily income of Jay Gould is estimated at $7,446; that of Cornelius Vanderbilt at $5,249; John M. Rockfeller, at $18,715 and William Waldorf Astor at $21,593. These horny handed sons of toil" appear to be doing reasonably well, and it is not probable that they will inaugurate a strike for higher wages.

A remarkable coincidence is reported from Elm Grove this State. A census was taken preparatory to corporating the village as a town with the following result: Number of males over 21 years of age 148; number of males under 21 years of age 128; number of females over 16 years of age 148; number of females under 16 years of age 148; grand total 592.

The best authorities give 1,400,000,000 as the present population of the earth. Some writers on the classification of the population of the world according to the religion professed, have estimated the number of Christians of all denominations—Protestants, Roman Catholics and Greeks—to be 420,000,000. This leaves one billion, or as it might otherwise be expressed, near 1,000,000,000 to be followers of other religions. The most widely diffused non-Christian religions are the Mohammedan, the Brahminical, the Confucian, the Buddhistic and Fetish worships.

The Louisiana Lottery Company will make a tremendous effort to secure a new lease of life from the Legislature of that State, which has just entered upon its annual session. Any amount of license fee which the Legislature would be at all likely to demand would be promptly paid, and the State is sadly in need of money for many purposes. The opponents of the lottery are likely to have a hard fight, as it is reasonable to suppose that private as well as public inducements will be offered to members to consent to the lease.

WASHINGTON LETTER

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 16th.—The sensation of the week in Congress was the tariff speech of Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, republican member from Cincinnati, Ohio. He said a great deal, and evidently meant more than he said. He has kicked out of the Republican traces on the tariff issue and will not be whipped back. It requires courage for a man to step outside of the party lines for the purpose of stating whole-some truths, but Mr. Butterworth was equal to the occasion and, while he has no doubt invited the displeasure of the blind party press, the people who have become tired of the swish of the party lash will applaud his utterances.

Mr. Butterworth said that the price of an article was not reduced on account of competition alone. It was reduced on account of the improved methods of manufacture.

The committee had tried to do the best it could in framing the bill, but it was not always safe to rely altogether upon the testimony of the beneficiaries under a law. (Applause on Democratic side). He had indicated his belief respecting the proper function of a tariff act and would sooner resign his seat than depart one hair's breadth from that belief. Of course he respected the wisdom of the committee, but why was Paul favored and Peter turned down? Why increase the profits of certain classes? He could name capitalists whose profits had exceeded those of all the agriculturists in any State of the Union. (Applause on Democratic side.)

If, when we had protected equally and lifted up all our industries, and the time should then come when we could not hold our own—being the most intelligent the freest and ablest people on earth—then we had better retire from the field. (Democratic applauses)

Mr. Butterworth then proceeded to expound his views touching reciprocity with Canada. He said that we were endeavoring to cultivate relations with 50,000,000 people to the southward, and yet were afraid of Canada. Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant were not suspected of lack of patriotism, yet they favored reciprocity. There were some things in the bill he did not like. He had known of an industry that had been able to make $60,000,000, dividends on a capital of $1,250,000.

Protection! Why, the country could in such cases better afford to keep these men in the Fifth Avenue Hotel, pay their board and expenses, and set them up in the banking business. He favored proper protection, but these men held the world in their grip. When he said that he did not favor that kind of protection, he was told: "You are not sound on the tariff." The time is come when some little concern should be shown to American homes and American firesides. A great body of employes in this country was foreign. In some factories in the East they were known on the rosters by numbers because of unfamiliarity with their names. He did not believe it was wise or prudent to make such a sweeping reduction in sugar to be supplanted by a bounty. What he wanted to avoid were such features as he had pointed out in this bill there was a thing as paying too much for an industry. Such was the case with tin plate. The duty would be a tax on every farmer's patch; on every can of goods: That tax would amount to $50,000,000 before the manufacturers of tinplate could declare a dividend. He was anxious that his party should not take a false step.

The silver tongued Senator Jones from the erstwhile silver state of Nevada made a five hours silver speech in the Senate this week and demonstrated to his own satisfaction at least that the cloud had a silver lining. I will give you some of his jingle: "Remonetized silver and activity will replace stagnation; movement will supplant inertia; courage will banish fear; confidence will dispel doubt; hope will supersede despair."

The act of Congress, which shall happily solve it, will constitute a degree of emancipation as veritable as any that ever freed serf from thraldom, but more universal in its application. It will proclaim the freedom of the white race the world over; it will lift the bowed head of labor; it will hush the threnody of toil. It will inaugurate the true renaissance—a renaissance of prosperity, without which industry, learning, science, literature, art are but apples of Sodom.

Rally for the Bonanza Senator! no Sophomore could have done prettier!

A bill in which the country is greatly interested was introduced in the Senate yesterday by Mr. Edmunds. It is to establish here the University of the United States, and the bill provides for a corporation, to be governed by a board of regents, the President, Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, the Attorney General, Postmaster General, Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of Agriculture, Chief Justice of the United States, and twelve citizens of the United States. All branches of education are to be taught.

A Meeting.

A number of the citizens of Hillsboro and vicinity met in the Academy, May 15th to hear the address of Mr. J. T. Black, of Monroe Co., W. Va., on the subject of the Farmer's Alliance, and to consider the propriety of organizing one at this place.

On motion of Capt. Wm. L. McNeel, Dr. Mat. Wallace, was chosen to preside over the meeting.

Capt. McNeel then introduced Mr. J. T. Black, who pointed out in a very clear and forcible manner the advantages to be gained through this union. He showed that every other class was organized for self-protection, and that the farmers, without organization were left a prey for avarice minopoly and capital.

After some questions as to the nature and practical working of this order, answered by Mr. Black, names were enrolled for a permanent organization of a Farmers' Alliance. Sixty names were enrolled, twenty-five gentlemen and thirty-five ladies.

It was resolved, that this organization be known as "The Little Levels Farmers' Alliance."

The following is a list of the officers elected viz:

President—Capt. Wm. L. McNeel; Vice-President—M. A. Dunlap; Secretary—C. J. Stulting; Treasurer—M. J. McNeel; Lecturer—Isaac McNeel; Assistant Lecturer—Dr. J. A. Larue; Door Keeper—Geo. Clendenen; Assistant Door Keeper—R. K. Burns; Sergeant-at-Arm—Jas. H. Welford; Business Agent—Alvin Clark.

It was resolved to meet in Academy at Hillsboro, on the 2nd and 4th Saturday of each month at 2 o'clock p. m.

On motion the secretary was ordered to send to the POCAHONTAS TIMES, for publication a short account of the proceedings of this meeting.

Deputy Marshal Killed.

Deputy Marshal W. M. Bean was shot through the head on last Thursday afternoon near Gap Mills, Monroe county, by Constable Henry Eggeston, and died about two hours later. Eggleston had an execution against him and was trying to levy upon a buggy in which Beans was riding when he drew a pistol and Eggleston shot him. He gave himself up and is now in jail at Union.

A Ghastly Find on Files Creek.

On the 14th inst., while Charlie Stalnaker was hunting his cows, on Files creek, about seven miles east of Beverly, he was attracted by a stench to a point where he found the body of Paul Louk hanging to a small sapling, the knees touching the ground. He had apparently been dead for two weeks, the tongue protruding from the mouth and the eyes eaten out by worms. This is either a suicide or one of the foulest crimes. He was about the only witness for the State in a murder case at Beverly, and when wanted on the trial, was missing, and has not beenseen since till found dead, as above stated.—Elkins News.

The assessed value of property in Virginia in 1880 was $303,997,613, and in 1888 it was $344,169,473, being an increase of $40,171,860 in eight years.

Richmond citizens estimate that between 40,000 and 50,000 visitors will be in the city on the 29th inst.

Seven prisoners escaped from the Martinsburg jail on the 10th inst.

A colored man in Richmond stole nine eggs sometime ago. Last week he was tried and found guilty by the Hustings Court and sent to the penitentiary for five years.

Outwitting A Custom Officer.

The famous Hungarian, Count Zichy, who lived on a princely income in Vienna, was, in his younger days, well known all over Europe on account of the bets he made and generally won. Once, when there was a heavy duty imposed on every head of cattle entering the Austrian capital, he made a bet that he would carry a lamb duty fee through the gate of Vienna, and that the gate-keeper, who acts as imperial officer, adjusting and receiving the duty, would be glad to let him pass.

Next morning, the count, disguised in the clothes of a butcher, his butcher knife in his hand, his shirt sleeves rolled up, and carrying a heavy sack on his shoulder, made his way to one of the fashionable gates of Vienna. But the watchful officer soon espied him.

"What have you in that sack, fellow?"

"A dog, sir."

"A dog! Dog yourself! Down with that sack! I know fellows like you sometimes carry dogs in sacks through the gates, and sell them for mutton in town. Down with your sack!"

"But it's nothing but a dog, and a bad dog, too. I will—"

"Never mind what you will. Down with your sack!"

The officer pulled the sack from the supposed butcher's shoulder, cut the string, and, sure enough, out jumped one of the biggest dogs in Vienna. The dog rushed against the faithful government servant, landed him several steps away in the gutter, and then left for parts unknown. After him went the young butcher, shaking his big knife before the eyes of the frightened officer, and exclaiming:

"I'll settle you after I catch that dog."

About two hours afterward, the face of the butcher again appeared before the raised window of the gate office.

"I have just caught that dog again. Would you like to look at him?"

"Get away! Get out, you and your infernal dog!" And with a crash the smiling butcher entered Vienna.

But no dog was that time in his sack, but the fattest lamb that could be found in the suburbs of the capital.

BOOMING THE TOWN.—"That's the sort of a town to live in," remarked Seedley taking his eyes from the paper.

"What about it?"

"Why, it's so healthy that nobody was ever known to die there until the only undertaker in the place had to die himself in order to introduce the fashion and give the business a boom."

It is wrong to marry for wealth, but it is foolish to marry for poverty and when you have got the wealth, you see, it is sometimes hard to undo the wrong.

If a woman would believe less of what a man tells her before marriage and more of what he tells after, the wedded state would be a much more harmonious affair.

Visitor—I heard your pastor to-day, and for a fashionable preacher he is certainly very unusual.

Parishioner—In what way think you?

Visitor—He talks like a man who has experienced religion.

Mrs. Figg—"Isn't there any way to get rid of that youdg Jinks who keeps calling on Clara, without positively insulting him?" Mr. Figg—"Why; certainly, Just give him th baby to hold the next time he comes." Mrs. Figg—"Do you reckon that'll start him?" Mr. Figg—"Why, I should snicker if it won't!"

"Johnnie," said a prominent mine operator to his youngest the other day, "I'll give you a dollar if you'll dig up the front yard already for your sister's new garden."

"All right," said Jonnie, thoughtfully, "but I shall have to ask for 25 percent. of the contract price in advance. Not as an evidence of good faith, but for working capital."

"Work—what do you mean?"

"Well, you see, I guess I'll just bury the quarter somewhere, and tell all the boys in the neighborhood that a pirate hid some treasure around there. When they strike that quarter, they'll make the dirt fly, I can tell you. In that way I can clean up about seventy five per cent. In fact I——"

"Well, what!"

"In fact I don't know but what I can also arrange so as to find that quarter myself. I'll work it just like that salted mine you were telling mamma about unloading on the street, last night."

And the father wept tears of joy, as he thought what a cold day it would be for Jay and Rufus when this boy grew up.

JOSEPH KENDALL'S BROTHER.

BY ARTHUR MERRICK.

There was a snow storm on the morning of the day fixed for the execution of Jonas Toms, who had been convicted of the murder of the old farmer, Joseph Kendall. The down train on the branch from X——to the county seat had come through without great difficulty, and the up train—with a load of morbidly curious men, who had taken passage for the purpose of witnessing the hanging—was at last reported as having reached the county seat. So the road was open, and if the snow did not drift into the cuts, there would be no need of sending out the snow plow.

Jonas Toms was looking through the grating of his cell when the whistle of up train reached him, and for a half hour, he waited expectantly, hope not failing him until the Sheriff came to the cell door and shook hands with him in silence.

"She did not come?" the condemned said, desparingly.

"No. She was not on the train, but there are two hours yet and I have put a deputy at the telegraph office with orders to run here at once with any message."

"You are very kind, Sheriff," Jonas faltered and turned away from the grated door.

"It wouldn't be human not to try to make an ugly job like this as easy as possible," muttered the Sheriff, "and I never was sure Jonas was guilty, though he couldn't prove he wasn't."

The Sheriff's opinion of the case was shared by a great many citizens of the county of——and they had signed a petition to the Governor for a respite for the prisoner, and a commutation of his sentence, if the Governor could not see his way clear to grant a pardon. With this petition Mrs. Jonas Toms had gone to the capital to make use of it in pleading for her husband's life. That morning the prisoner had looked for her return with definite information concerning him—whether he was to die or not. As no word had been received from her, he was not hopeful, and he had really expected her to come back to him only for a final leave taking.

Yet, when the Sheriff spoke of the telegraph, hope asserted itself again and Jonas was buoyed with imagining his devoted wife wrestling still the Governor and refusing to abandon the struggle for her husband until it was useless to plead longer.

And while the condemned was thus catching at a straw, and his heart was overflowing with love and gratitude to his devoted, tireless wife, the deputy left the telegraph office and hastened to the jail. The Sheriff seeing him coming ran to meet him but paused abruptly when he could see clearly his subordinate's face.

"The operator can't git X——," said the deputy. "The wire must be down."

The Sheriff groaned and trembled as if shaken by a strong wind. "Go back," he said, "go back and wait, for if there's word to come it will get here."

The Sheriff spoke as if he expected a miracle to be wrought to deliver him from the awful legal duty of taking a man's life to satisfy the vengeance of the law, but yet he, having once more obtained control of his nerves, walked firmly back to jail, where he proceeded at once to conclude the preparations for the solemn act.

Meanwhile a crowd of men was surging about the jail entrance, and some boys had climbed a tree to look over the wall at the scaffold. The deputy in charge of the door admitted those who had passes, and kept back the others, who nevertheless clamored to be let in. Those who were within the gates by permission trampled the snow in the yard and impatiently wished the Sheriff would "hurry up," while the other prisoners in their cells were silent and curious and glad—not glad because one who had been with them in compulsory association was to be hanged, but glad because their crimes were not so heinous as his; and they all vowed to reform lest they, too, should end on the gallows.

But at X—— the telegraph operator was frantic. He had called the operator at the county seat and could not get a reply—he was in despair and he thumped the key. There before him lay a message from the Governor of the State.

"To the Sheriff of——County:

"Respite of ten days granted to Jonas Toms."

The telegram was signed by the Governor's Secretary, but apparently it was as useless as if it had never been written. The county seat was thirty miles distant, and there was but an hour to get word of the respite to the Sheriff before it would be forever too late.

A restless man walked up and down the long platform—he seemed to be waiting for a train and impatient because it was delayed. He noticed the telegraph operator's agitation and made inquiry concerning the cause. The operator showed him a message and the man's face blanched as he demanded tremulously:

"Why don't you send it?"

"I can't, I say, for the wire is not working."

"The man paused a moment irresolutely and then said: "Give the message to me, seal it in an envelope with wax. I will take it to the Sheriff."

"How?"

"On that engine." He pointed to a locomotive that was standing on a siding with steam up, but was not manned—the engineer being at his home, and the fireman having made a trip to the round house.

"Give me a switch key," the stranger said, nervously," and be ready with the telegram when I come past the platform."

The operator gave the man the key, but instantly reached for it again as he exclaimed: "The gravel train—it is up the road."

"Never mind. I'll scare it on a siding. You have the message ready."

Quickly the stranger ran to the switch and turned it for the siding. A yard man noticed him, but at the distance thought him the station agent, who, at the time, was away from his office, fortunately for the stranger's plan. The engine responded to the throttle and came out on the main track slowly—the yardman looking after it in astonishment, then starting on a run to see what mad man's impulse seized to control the man at the lever! The telegraph operator was rapid in his movements, and when the engine steamed past the platform on the track that led to the county seat he delivered to the man, whom he now regarded as a hero, the message properly sealed and authenticated.

"God bless you," he called after the unknown, "and save you from the gravel train."

The road to the county seat was a single track and the gravel train sent out to keep the road-bed clear of drifts was liable to be collided with upon any curve by the engine running without schedule or orders, but the stranger merely smiled as he pulled the throttle lever further back. The engine dashed up the track, the engineer standing in the door-way of his home and looking at it aghast, while the station agent and train dispatcher hastened to the telegraph office to learn the reason of the engine's departure on a "wild cat" trip.

The engineer rushed up to the platform where stood the operator explaining to the dispatcher how it happened that the stranger took out the engine.

"But he will not get through," said the dispatcher, "for he has no fireman."

"Yes, he has," exclaimed the engineer, "he's doin' the firin' too. He's just lettin' her run, he'll just fire and whistle."

And, as if to confirm the engineer's statement, the scream of the steam reached their ears—the whistle shrieking a frantic demand for a clear track.

At the jail the Sheriff's jury were drawn up in the corridor, solemnly waiting for the conclusion of the last conference of the condemned with his spiritual adviser. The Sheriff restlessly paced the flagging, while one of the deputies nervously fingered a black cap and the other toyed with the cords to be used in pinioning the prisoner.

The Sheriff, who had repeatedly looked at his watch in a way that seemed to beg time to go more slowly, glanced at it at last with a heavy sigh and went to the jail entrance for a final look toward the telegraph office. The deputy stationed there was not in sight and the executive official turned with a heavy heart to the prisoner's cell.

"Come," he said, and the heavy foot-falls of the jury sounded dismally through the corridor.

"It is time," he said gently to the prisoner, who courageously stepped into the corridor and bravely faced the jury while the deputies bound his arms and slipped the cord of the cap over his head. He was ready, but just when the word to move to the yard was given, he turned a longing glance toward the main entrance, as if he hoped to see his wife appear there suddenly.

"Slowly the procession moved, the prisoner leaning on the arm of the clergyman, his back toward the main entrance, his temples throbbing many beats between the foot-falls of his executioners, who stepped heavily and in time with him, as if to deaden to him the sound of his own feet, which shuffled in spite of him, the nails in the heels of his boots rasping on the stone floor.

And then came shrieking through the corridor the whistle of a locomotive—strident scream on scream rising higher each second and indicating that the engine was approaching at terrible speed. The heart of every man in the jail leaped. The prisoner stood still and his lips moved as if in silent thanksgiving, for to him the shrill sounds were trumpeting his freedom. The Sheriff rushed to the jail entrance, a commotion rose among the visitors who had grown cold in the snow, and they began to crowd into the jail. The deputies momentarily forgot the prisoner, while they contended with the impatient and excited spectators, forcing them back to the yard.

The conductor of the gravel train was startled when the whistle penetrated his ears with its cry for a clear track, and he was glad that he had reached with his train the safety of the siding at the county seat when he saw the engine leaping toward the town on a steep down grade.

The deputy stationed at the telegraph office ran out on the track to learn the meaning of the terrible shrieking. The operator ran with him, and the crowd around the jail stampeded toward the station. The whistle ceased its screams and a man was seen standing between the cab and the tender, as the engine, with unabated speed forged toward the station.

The crowd stood still in silence as the man lowered himself on the step to the cab.

"Heavens! he is going to jump," said the deputy, and the crowd fell pell mell back out of the way, but every one heard the man cry:

"Take this to the Sheriff.

He waved his hand in which he clutched something yellow.

"A man's life depends on it," he shouted again.

Then he jumped and rolled to the feet of the depty, who wrenched an envelope from the grasp of his twitching fingers. Without pausing to see whether the man was alive or dead, the crowd ran after the deputy, and no one looked around when the engine crashed into the dump and was totally wrecked.

The Sheriff in trembling, eager haste, opened the envelope and read aloud the telegram.

The crowd shouted and returned to the station where a physician with the calmness due to his profession was endeavoring to restore the senseless man to life. At last he succeeded. The stranger opened his eyes and looked in a bewildered manner at the crowd of curious men and boys. But presently his eyes lighted with intelligence and he asked in a whisper:

"Was I in time?"

"Yes," said the surgeon.

"Thank God. I killed Joseph Kendall and this is my expiation. I am Joseph Kendall's brother."

With great presence of mind the physician wrote the confession in his note book and then read it aloud.

"Is that correct?" he asked.

The stranger nodded and his lips moved, but the uttered no sound. He died while the doctor was having one or two reliable witnesses sign his confession.

"No, Hiram," said the young girl, sadly, "I cannot be your wife. We are too compatible."

"Compatible?" he exclaimed, "isn't that the very reason why—"

"Not in our case. I should probably insist from motives of economy on dispensing with a servant and doing my housework, and you would probably let me do it, Hiram."

Rev. Mr. Winkwonk—My hearers, I shall have to ask your indulgence for a few minutes. I forgot my manuscript and have sent my little boy for it.

His son (coming in)—Mam couldn't find the writin', but here's the book you copied it from.

Guest (in country hotel)—Say, there were bugs in the bed I slept in last night.

Proprietor—Is that so?

Guest—Yes, sir, but I can tell you how to get rid of them.

Proprietor—Go ahead.

Guest—Charge them the same price for a night's lodging as you have me.

Richmond, Va., May 23.—The announcement in dispatches sent out from New York to the effect that John L. Sullivan had agreed to come to Virginia and fight Joe McAuliffe for $10,000 in July, and the negro Jackson for $25,000 in August has attracted attention among the officials in this State.

It was represented that Mr. J. M. Bailey, one of the corporators of the Virginia Sporting Association, whose charter of incorporation was rushed through the legislature in its closing hours last session, had a conference with the result mentioned.

Mr. Bailey and those interested with him in his Association claim that under their charter they have a perfect right to have on their grounds prize fights and other sports in violation of the laws or of Virginia. If any arrangements have been made with Sullivan and other prize fighters to "slug" in this State, it remains to be seen whether they will be permitted to do so. The unanimous sentiment of the authorities and the people is against it.

Some of the best lawyers here claim that a fatal defect in the act incorporating the company upon whose grounds it is proposed that Sullivan shall fight, is the failure to cite the law which it claims to have repealed. This is a constitutional requirement and will be shown when the matter comes before the Courts. Under the present laws prize fighting is punishable by imprisonment in the State Prison for not less than five years and a fine of $1,000. If Sullivan or any other prize fighter comes to this State for the purpose of pounding each other they are certain to be arrested as soon as they put foot on Virginia soil, and the validity of the charter will then be tested.

The Republicans have called a Convention at Hinton to be held Aug. 21st, 1890, for the purpose of nominating a candidate to succeed Jno. D. Alderson in Congress. Col. J. W. Davis, of Lewisburg, has declared himself a candidate, and it is thought his chances for the nomination are good.

Hon. Wm. L. Wilson, of this State is spoken of as a suitable man to succeed John G. Carlisle as democratic Leader of the House; Mr. Carlisle being promoted to the Senate.

Mr. J. H. McGinnis, although he has failed to get Mr. Alderson's seat in congress, as he so much desires to do, is giving the administration a deal of trouble. He has recommended a gentleman for the position of postmaster at Charleston, whom the administration finds to be unacceptable to the Republicans of this city and to the party in this district generally. Under the circumstances the administration finds itself in a rather delicate position in regard to the Charleston postmastership. Postmaster Ashby's term expired last Sunday and his successor would have been appointed but for McGinnis' determination to recommend the appointment of a gentleman who is not acceptable of the party. By party usage the Republicans are entitled the office, and they are just now joining in a general but subdued kick because they haven't gotten possession of it. They begin to wish that McGinnis was transported beyond the Northern Sea.

THERE is a wide-spread kick against the impertinent questioned the census enumerators are to ask. Several weeks ago when the questions were first made public the REGISTER took occasion to point out that the government was not warranted in asking them, and that any citizen was fully warranted in refusing to answer or in answering at random. Though the penalty for refusal to answer is $100 fine we do not believe any court would enforce it. It is none of the government's business whether a man owns his house or not or whether it is mortgaged.

Neither has the government any right to ask such impertinent questions as whether or not a person is all right mentally and physically or whether or not he is diseased, deformed, etc. The popular protest against these senseless questions has already caused a resolution to be introduced in the Senate looking to their modification.—Wheeling Register.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23.—There is a very common impression among the American people, especially those who disdain to bother themselves with the tiresome details of Congressional action and public finance, that the U. S. treasuries are filled with inexhaustible loads of gold and silver, and that the problem of "reducing the surplus" is the great urgency of the times. All manner of schemes have been suggested to this end, and by those who should know better! A few billions for sea-coast defenses, with a neat fortune for every soldier, and a good farm modestly stocked, for every poor man it is thought would somewhat relieve this bulging state of affairs. But it remained for Senator Plumb of Kansas to bring out the most fantastic remedy. He has introduced two bills in Congress providing for an organization called the "Grand Army of Labor." All citizens of 21 years of age are entitled to membership. No one shall work more than 4 hours a day, not more than 5 days a week, nor more than six weeks without an intermission of two weeks. Every country in the U. S. is to be provided with a governmental farm. The government is also to undertake public enterprise for the purpose of providing labor for members, whose daily recompense is to be $4.

Where is all this money coming from? The last statement from the Treasury showed the amount of available cash on hand to be about $35,000,000. Senator Gorman, a member of the appropriation committee, stated before the Senate that the pension payments from 1891 for several years will amount to $300,000,000, and nobody contradicted him. The new tariff bill is said to reduce the public revenues about $71,000,000. This will leave for all public purposes, except pensions, about $180,000,000 of the annual revenue, and which is also about the size of the deficit that will be found in the Treasury at the end of the next fiscal year if the bills calling for expenditures which have passed one house and are likkly to pass the other, are perfected. Besides, the importers are organizing and are determined to cut down the rates on every article in the tariff schedule.

A delegation of 250 representing all the wholesale importing Houses of New York City, will besiege the Capital this week, and the importers of other cities will also be on hand. In view of the indifference of the majority in Congress to money matters these visiting delegations will no doubt be graciously received and accommodated.

One hundred and eighty five private pension bills have been passed by Congress this session.

Senator Ingalls has introduced a bill to put the minimum rate for invalid pensions at $4 per month.

Senator Sherman has introduced a bill providing for a special pension of $25 per month to the surviving soldiers, sailors and marines who were on board the steamer "Sultana" when her boiler exploded April 27, 1865. Twenty three hundred enlisted men who had been prisoners in the South were packed on board and sent North. About 8 miles above Memphis, the boilers of the steamer exploded at 2 o'clock at night. About 1700 were killed or drowned, and about 200 died next day from exposure in the water. One hundred and forty one survivors have signed a petition for the passage of the bill.

Senator Butler presented the petition of the heads of nine families, aggregating 72 persons, that Congress appropriate $100 per capita to enable them to emigrate to Liberia and maintain themselves six months. The petition had a printed heading, and it was said that an organized movement in the South indicated a scheme of wholesale deportation of the colored people of South Carolina. If these are not good and respectable citizens they have no claim upon public charity. If these are good citizens why should the government pay $500 or $600 to get a family of them out when it lets any number of bad citizens in, and charges them nothing?

In the House the tariff debate this week was no better than a squabble, the amendments being regularly voted down as they were offered. The bill was voted on Wednesday and passed the House all right. But wait till it gets to the Senate. Senator Allison is waiting for it. The west will show its teeth. He says that he is profoundly convinced that "the conditions have changed," and will handle the McKinley bill so that the author won't know it when he sees it. In the Senate Mr. Teller denounced the Windom silver bill in vigorous terms, and promised that with free coinage, wheat would go up to $1.50. He didn't say that it would go to that price in Liverpool where the world's price is made, but virtually confessed that inflation was the object.

ORDER OF PUBLICATION.

At rules held in the Circuit Court Clerk's office of Pocahontas County, west Virginia, on the first Monday in May 1890.

Mary E. Piles vs. George C. McGlaughlin. — In Chancery.

The object of this suit is to collect a claim of the plaintiff Mary E. Piles, against the defendant George C. McGlaughlin, for Sixty Dollars, with interest thereon from November 1th, 1889, by subjecting to the payment thereof and costs of this suit so much as may be necessary of a tract of about 175 acres of land lying in Pocahontas Co., W. Va. near Green Bank, conveyed to said George C. McGlaughlin by J. C. Arbogast and wife, and upon which an attachment is issued in this suit has been levied to secure such payment.

And it appearing by affidavit filed that the defendant George C. McGlaughlin is a non-resident of the State of west Va., it is ordered that he do appear here within one month after the date of the first publication of this order, and do what is necessary to protect his interest in this suit.

—Savages expect to imbibe bravery by drinking the blood of their brave enemies. A more enlighted method of vitalizing the blood is by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It braces up the nerves and gives strength and fortitude to endure the trials of life.

—Double Shovel Plows, Bull tongues and iron and steel shapes of all kinds for home-made plows at Simms, Workman & Best's, Ronceverte, W. Va.

—The Editor, Jno. E. Campbell, is visiting in Virginia this week and the "Times" is running itself, a good excuse for all defects.

—Ex Gov. E. W. Wilson will address the people of Pocahontas county at Huntersville on Monday, June 16th, the first day of Circuit court. He will discuss the tariff question particularly as it relates to the agricultural interest of this section. The Governor is a vigorous talker and believes in calling things by their right names. Every body will do well to come out and hear him.

—We have a lot of last years new Deering Mowers that we will sell cheap for cash. Call early. John Warts & Co., Frankford, W. Va.

—H. S. Rucker and C. F. Moore were down at Hillsboro last Saturday on professional business.

—L. M. McClintic, Jas. A. Sharp and Gilbert Sharp were fishing up William's River last week, with good success we are told.

—We are informed that everything sold at Mr. W. F. Ervine's last Friday brought all it was worth. It is usually so at public sales.

—Last Sunday evening at about 9 o'clock some one carried away from the Wagner Hotel a trunk belonging to Mr. J. P. McComb, which among other things contained about $225 in money. Early monday morning the trunk was found in a meadow not far from the Hotel. It had been broken open and searched but the thief in his haste had overlooked $100 of the money; succeeding however in escaping with about $125. It is not positively known who the thief is, but all the circumstances indicate that it was a certain individual who had been stopping at the Hotel for some weeks, and who unceremoniously disappeared about the same time the trunk walked out.

—Some people wonder why the "Boom" don't strike Pocahontas. They see no reason why we should not advance as well as other places. The reason is obvious. Just take a glance at the road around the hill opposite Huntersville, look at the new road near the Lockridge ford, stand on the bank of Knapp's Creek and view the bridge across it, go then to the records and see what our people are taxed to make these shabby improvements, and you will wonder that Pocahontas has managed to escape bankruptcy. Taxation is no burden if the revenue be so applied as to enhance the value of property, but where the purse is constantly drained with no visible result, except such as [illegible], it is folly to talk about public prosperity or "Boom."

[illegible]

—On last Saturday a terrible rain and hail storm passed over the vicinity of Hillsboro between 11 and 12 oclock a. m., doing considerable damage to gardens and growing crops. Shortly afterward the sky partially cleared up and the sun shone out as if the storm were all over, when to the surprise of every one a vivid flash of lightning was seen and simultaneously was heard a startling peal of thunder. It was soon discovered that the lightning had struck the stable of W. H. Overholt, standing a very short distance from his dwelling and store house. At first it was thought the stable was on fire, but fortunately it was not. There were six horses in the stable at the time, two belonging to Mr. Overholt, two to Mr. Henry Perry, one to Mr. John R. Marshall and one to Mr. C. F. Moore. They were all standing with their heads close together. One of Mr. Perry's horses was instantly killed; the other one, one of Mr. Overholt's and Mr. Moore's were also knocked down by the shock, but not hurt at all. The loss to Mr. Perry was a very serious one. He is an industrious man of limited means, and is left without a team, having but the two horses, the better one of which was killed. The destruction however was small to what it might have been, as one or two parties who had been feeding the horses had been away from the stable but a few minutes before it was struck.

Obituary.

Died, at Linden, Fauquier County Va., May the 11th, 1890 of Bright's disease of the Kidneys, William B. Gatewood aged 43 years and 10 months. He was born at Mountain Grove, Bath Co., Va., and was a son of the late Samuel V. Gatewood, and brother of Col. A. C. L. Gatewood, of Big Spring in this county. Mr. Gatewood married Miss Mary DeButts, of Fauquir Co., Va., who is left a widow with four children—two girls and two boys. He was a kind and affectionate husband and father, and one of the best of neighbors. For more than [illegible] years, he was in the employ of the Va. Midland and Danville Railroad, as general live stock agent and was regarded as one of the best agents in their company. The large concourse of neighbors and railroad officials that attended his funeral as well as the large number of telegrams condolence and sympathy that were received by his sorrowing widow, as soon as the news of his death ran over the wires, were evidence of his standing as a citizen. He was a member of no church, but he was one of the most moral of men, from his youth to his death. Peace to his ashes.

A FRIEND.

Committee Meeting.

The Democratic Executive Committee of Pocahontas County will meet at Huntersville on Monday, June 16th, 1890. It is hoped that every member will be present.

C. F. MOORE, Chairman.

The General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, now in session at St. Louis, recently elected Drs. Atticus G. Haywood and O. P. Fitzgerold to the Episcopacy. Dr. Hawgood has for a long time been looked upon as one of the most advanced thinkers of the Country, while Dr. Fitzgerold has gained an enviable reputation since his promotion to the head of the Nashville Advocate. He is a brilliant talker and charming author. Both men will make able and acceptable Bishops.

—It is said the members of the "Bath Squadron" contemplate a reunion at the Warm Springs, in Bath Co., on the 4th of July. Several of our Pocahontas citizens belonged to the Squadron.

Mr. McKinley offered an amendmen to the tariff bill increasing the duty on lamp chimneys, which was adopted. Probably this is to prevent the poor workingman from spending his wages in reading Democratic newspapers.

The Democratic Executive Committee will meet at Hinton on the 7th day of June, to perfect a plan of action for the party in the Third District.

Schoolboy (poring over his lesson) —Father, what language do they speak in Chili?

Father—H'm! The language spoken in Chili, my son, the—er—language spoken —er—in Chili, is do you find that question in the book you are studying, my son?

Schoolboy —No, but I thought I'd like to know.

Father (severely)—Then don't ask it my son If it isn't in the book it isn't proper for you to know.

A man up in Maine, whose wife was a most inveterate talker, hit upon the following plan to gain a much needed rest. He told his wife that he was going to Assangwatawogamagogwongtongowa fishing, and then went round and got his friends to call at his house and ask where he was When he returned his wife had one jaw fractured and the other one out of place.

His mother (suddenly opening pantry door)—Here now, sir, what are you doing up there?

Tommie—Oh, nothin,' Ma—nothin'. I'm jist lookin' fer my Sunday school lesson sheet; it's got lost somehow.

—"Aunt Sue died this morning very suddenly," said Mr. Fungle to his wife, as he read a telegram. "Is that so? Why only last week she had her teeth filled with solid gold."

Former" Pal"—What do you mean by that advertisement in the paper reading, "Big opening for right party with small capital. Fortune in a year?"

All Round Advertiser—I meant that there'll be a fortune for me in a year—if enough fools put their money into the big opening.

"There's only one fault I have to find with Dr. Pulpit's sermons," said Mrs. Poots, whose pew is in the back part of a large and fashionable church.

"What's that?" asked Mr. P.

"I can't hear one word he says."

"Humph! That's just what I like about 'em," grunted Poots.

An old couple were walking down street the other day reading signs, when they ran across one which the old man read thus: "Johnson's Shirt Store." "Well, I declare!" exclaimed the old lady. "I wonder how he tore it."

"Why, darling, what can be the matter with these onions?" he ejaculated as he pushed back his plate.

The young wife burst into tears. "There, I told the groder they smelt awful! And I soaked them in that nice cologne yesterday morning, too!"

He (rapturously)—O, my love, I adore you! My heart goes out to you! Can you not feel love's darts piercing your bosom!

She—Well, I do feel something. But I think it's a pin in my dress.

Mrs. Abrams—An' so your poor, tear husbant ees det. Vas he resignet?

Mrs. Isaacs—Yah, he vas villings to go. He said dere vas no moneys in der cloding peesiness nowatays.

"How much do you want for that cat."

"Ten dollars! That is an imported cat from Warsaw."

"Well, I don't wish for a Pole cat."

Customer—Is it customary to fee the waiter here.

Waiter—Yes, sir.

Customer—Then hand over your fee I've waited for you nearly an hour.

Aunt—Well, Bobby, what do you want to be when you grow up?

Bobby (remembering private seance in the woodshed)—An orphan.

THE ROMANCE OF A FLOOD.

BY HARRIET F. CROCKER.

They had parted coldly.

Richard Holmes had walked rapidly up the street to his boarding place with a white face, sternly set lips, his hands clasped tightly behind him, and his whole frame quivering with wounded pride and keen disappointment.

Eloise Ellison had turned her pretty face homeward with a proud little toss and a look of something like triumph in her coquettish dark eyes.

That she was a spoiled and petted beauty, every one in the village knew and that she was as wilful and capricious and exacting, as she was bright and pretty and bewitching, every one knew as well. The only child of the wealthy mill owner, from her infancy indulged in her every wish and fawned upon by admiring friends, it was no wonder that she was, when she chose to be, a most tyrannical specimen of young womanhood.

She had chosen to be such the afternoon she met Richard Holmes her father's bookkeeper, on the street, and allowed him to turn and walk beside her. It was raining, and she graciously closed her own elegant little umbrella to share the larger one he carried.

They had gone on together enjoying the rain, laughing and chatting gayly, gossiping in their light way about this and that happening in the social life of the village.

Perhaps he had chosen an inauspicious moment to declare his love and offer her his hand, but, inauspicious or not, he had spoken and recieved his answer.

They had exchanged a few hot words and then parted in a sudden frigidity which seized them both. She had added such scorn and disdain to her refusal that it was more than he could bear in silence. She had even insinuated to him that it was not herself he loved, but her father,s wealth. She had wounded him cruelly and intentionally, and he had left her suddenly with a cold adieu.

Eloise raised her own umbrella with a defiant little laugh, and a glance at the retreating figure, and then turned homeward humming a fragment of the latest opera.

Her father's bookkeeper! Presume to offer her his hand! It was absurd!

Thus she communed with herself as she went on up the street to her home. She tried to be angry at the presumption of the man, but in spite of herself she could not.

She had always admired him—yes, in a way she had quite liked him, and it was pleasing to her vanity to know he loved her, but marriage—that was another thing, indeed, and quite out of the question.

For days and days it rained. It grew [illegible] and wearisome.

Eloise wandering aimlessly about the drawing room looking over a [illegible] striking a few [illegible] going from window to window to look out at the [illegible] the [illegible] land scape was [illegible] lonesome and [illegible] of view.

Why did not [illegible] come? [illegible]

him! It had never occured to her to say that. She wished she had been less unkind that day—wished she had held him off a little longer at least— it used to be so pleasant to have him drop in for an hour or two.

The day was closing in dark and stormy. Eloise from the window looked at the swollen river, and the pools that stood here and there on the lawn.

Suddenly she stood erect, and looked eagerly at a well-known figure coming toward the house. It was Richard Holmes.

The girl stood watching his progress eagerly, as he picked his way among the pools of water, her lips parted, her pretty head thrown back, her dark eyes glad and bright.

"I am glad he is coming," she said, softly to herself, as she stood, surrounded by the creamy draperies of the window, waiting for him.

She heard his firm step on the piazza. She heard him ring the bell, and then speak a few words to the maid who opened the door.

Suddenly a great roar filled all the air, drowning the voices in the hall drowning the silvery chime of the little French clock, drowning everything, swallowing up everything in its awful volume of sound.

There was a terror in it unlike the heaviest crash of thunder—a strange and terrible menace in the sound, swelling and growing louder every moment.

Eloise stood paralyzed with fear. She was powerless to cry out, to move herself; she could only stand and listen to that awful, all pervading roar.

She did not think what it might mean. She had heard vague rumors of fears for the great dam above, but had not heeded.

In a moment it was all over; the sound had come upon her in all its awfulness. She fell back, overpowered with terror, and became unconscious.

A violent blow on her head roused her to herself. She found herself floating on the strong current, borne along at a sickening speed, upheld by the strength and fury of the roaring waters.

Near her she saw the great elm tree that stood before her house ever since she was a child. It must have been a branch of that which struck her and brought her back to life.

With great, dark eyes dilated with horror, and a face white and ghastly as the faces of the dead, the girl flew along. She had caught hold of the branches of the great tree, and was clinging with a grasp like death itself. Life was sweet—too sweet to lose. In her first moment of consciousness she had thought of Richard Holmes. Where could he be? Drowned? O, God forbid—not drowned—the thought was dreadful to her. In a flash she was revealed to herself. She loved him—loved him with her whole heart—had loved him all the time without knowing it. What had he come to the door for that night—it seemed ages ago to her now—to bring a message of warning? Her father—was he safe? O, Heaven! that appalling darkness—that dreadful roar of rushing waters!

She raised her voice and called "Richard!" It was lost in the roar [illegible] might be somewhere near her now.

She raised her voice again and called his name with a desperation born of fear and love. A dark object was floating near her, tossing up and down on the resistless current. She could see that it was a man clinging to a mass of boards. The face was turned from her, but the head was familiar. She called again, and the man turned and looked at her.

"Is it you, Eloise?" he screamed; and then she barely heard him—"you, Eloise! Thank God!"

She breathed a sigh of relief. She felt safe now—safe, even on the bosom of this rushing ocean of fierce waters and crashing debris—if he were near.

She saw that he was trying to get to her, but could not; that he dared not loose his hold of the boards and trust himself one instant in that mighty current. She could see his face, white and agonized, turned to her—always turned to her. Something had struck him and cut a gash in his head, and the blood was tickling down his pallid cheek; she could see it from where she clung in the branches of the elm tree.

She did not know that one beautiful, white arm was bare, bleeding from a cruel blow she had received—she did not realize the pain in her head where the tree had struck her—such things were trivial now. Life was the only thing to be thought of—life and death—if death should come.

A house came reeling down and struck the mass of boards to which Richard clung. The shock loosened his hold and tossed him far out in the water. The horrible under current sucked him in and he sank from sight. The next moment his white face showed above the water. Such horror and despair Eloise had never seen as she saw there. One last appealing look at her, one cry from his white lips, and he was gone again. Eloise prayed—prayed as she had never dreamed of praying before; crying aloud for help and pity in this time of need.

Richard came to the surface again—near her this time. Could she reach him? Only a little nearer—he was half unconscious and could not help himself. She leaned far out over the dark torrent, holding to the tree firmly with one arm and touched him with her hand—caught him by his collar and held his head above the water as they were borne along. She called to him wildly. He heard and understood, made one great effort to seize the branches of the tree, and at last with an almost superhuman strength, drew himself up into the sheltering arms of the old elm.

There he clung with what frail strength was left him; but he was too weak for words. It was no time for speech. The scene was more terrible than any of the imaginings of Dante. Great masses of timbers, that ten minutes before had been houses and homes, came rushing by with shrieking women clinging to them, and little children borne along upon them. Strong men were [illegible] the wagons, and horses and cattle were plunging madly for life among the ruins of great [illegible] crashing by. [illegible] waters. Eloise and Richard were hurled into the air and fell together clinging to whatever they could find—a door, a fence—anything to keep afloat. At last they climbed to the ridge pole of a house and clung there. All night they floated bruised and cut by heavy objects striking them, almost losing their hold many times, but never quite—tossing, plunging, flying with a speed that was terrible.

In the first gray dawn of morning they were rescued. Friendly hands drew them from their perilous position and bore them to a place of safety. There they lay for hours unconscious. The shock had been to great—human endurance had been too sorely tired.

The physicians who dressed their wounds and the nurses who cared for them shook their heads gravely over the young strangers given so mercifully into thier hands.

Richard woke to conciousness first, but lay with closed eyes, resting and trying to think why he was there and what had happened.

All at once he heard a voice he knew and loved. It was Eloise, delirous with fever. "Richard," she was saying: "I love you now, I loved you all the time, but I did not know it. Richard did the horrible waters drown you? O, my darling!"

He opened his eyes and looked across the room toward the weak voice lying away into silence. What he saw was Eloise lying on the snowy cot with closed eyes and flushed cheeks—Eloise pitifully thin and changed, but Eloise still, despite the lines of pain on her white brow, left there by the agony of that fatal night.

Richard, looking at her thus, loved her all the better for those marks of sorrow; they made her tenfold dearer to him; their mutual distress had welded together their souls forever.

It was a very quiet, very brief ceremony that made them man and wife. It was no time for merrymaking and rejoicing. Death and poverty were everywhere. Her father was among the lost; the servants were missing; many of her friends were gone from human sight forever. She was penniless. The beautiful home was entirely destroyed. Nothing that had been hers remained.

Nothing she had loved in the old days was left her. Nothing? Yes, thank God, her husband—her good, brave Richard! They had gone together through that dreadful night, their paths henceforth through life lay side by side.

Eloise was a changed woman. What had been wrong in her became good. What had been vain [illegible] beautiful and [illegible] What had been [illegible] changed woman. What had been wrong in her became good. What was vain and foolish became beautiful and pure. Her whole nature was changed—her heart ennobled and uplifted, made sweet and womanly and good.

Huntersville, W. Va.

June 5, 1890.

There is considerable criticism going the rounds on the fact that a magnificent monument has been erected to the Confederate General LEE, while the much talked of monument to GEN. GRANT has not yet been begun. Judge COLLIER, of Pittsburg, in his Decoration Day address alluded to the fact in this way:

"Our great commander needs no monument, but we do. The dead heed not, but the living must. Our pride, gratitude, love, honor and respect for ourselves and country; all unite in urging us to do our duty. Is it not sad that we should be behind our southern brethren, who yesterday unveiled a monument to their brave and faithful leader!"

THE STATUE OF GEN. LEE.

The Mercie bronze equestrian statue of General Robert E. Lee was unveiled in Richmond last Thursday, May 29th, a throng computed at from 100,000 to 1250,000 witnessing the event. It occupies a site at the west end of Franklin street at the intersection of two avenues, where it will remain for ages an impressive example of purity and virtue in all the relations of life.

The scene was unprecedented in the annals of that historic city From early morning till night the tap of the drum and the tramp of the soldiers forcibly reminded the older citizens of the stirring days of 61. While thousands of flags were unfurled to the breeze the national flag was displayed in the proportion of fifty to one of the Stars and Bars. Generals Early, Longstreet and Fitzhugh Lee, General Gordon, Wade Hampton and Governor Fowler were greeted with enthusiasm.

Arriving at the monument, the veterans faced the grand stand with the military behind them, the cavalry bringing up the rear. The artillery were posted north of the pedestal.

Gov. McKinney called the assembly to order and introduced Dr. Minnigerode, who offered prayer, after which Gen Jubal Early was called upon to preside. He made a brief speech and presented Col. Archer Anderson as orator of the day.

At the conclusion of Col. Anderson's address, General Joseph E. Johnston pulled the cord which held the covering of the statue and the veil dropped, exposing the beautiful bronze work of art to view when a mighty shout went up from the multitudes and a salute of one hundred guns was fired by the first battalion of artillery. The assemblage then slowly dispersed.

Counting the People.

The Eleventh Census of the United States will be taken during the month of June. The census enumerators began their work Monday, June 2, and will visit every house and ask questions concerning every person and every family in the United States. The questions that will be asked call for the name of every person residing in the United States on the first day of June, with their sex and age, and whether white, black, mulatto, quadroon, octoroon, or Chinese, Japanese, or Indian. Inquiry will be made also of every person as to whether they are single, married, widowed, or divorced, and, if married, whether married during the census year. The place of birth of the father and mother of each person, will also be called for, as well as a statement as to the profession trade, or occupation followed and the number of months unemployed during the census year. For all persons ten years of age or over a return must be made by the enumerator as to the number able to read and write, and also the number who can speak English. For those who can not speak English the particular language of dialect spoken by them will be ascertained. For children of school age, also, the the number of months they attended school will be recorded by the census enumerators. In the case enumerators. In the case of mothers an inquiry will be made as to the number of children they have had, and the number of these children living at the present time.

This inquiry is to be made of women who are or have been married, including all who are widows or have been divorced. Foreign born males of adult age, that is, 21 years of age or over, will be asked as to the number of years they have been in the United States, and whether they are naturalized or have naturalization papers. Of the head of each family visited the question will be asked as to the number of persons in the family, and whether his home is owned or hired; also, if owned, whether the home is free from mortgage incumbrance. If the head of the family is a farmer, similar inquiries will be made concerning the ownership of the farm. In addition to these inquiries, all of which are made on the population schedule, the law under which the census is taken makes provision for special inquiries concerning such of the population as may be mentally or physically detective in any respect, that is, insane, feebleminded, deaf, blind, or crippled, or who may be temporarily disabled by sickness, disease, or accident at the time of the enumerator's visit. Certain special inquiries will also be made concerning inmates of prisons and reformatories and of charitable and benevolent institutions. Besides this, a statement will be called for concerning all persons who have died during the census year, giving their name, age, sex, occupation, and cause of death.

This official count of people comes but once in ten years, and every family and every person should consider it to be their duty to answer the question of the census enumerators willingly and promptly, so that definite and accurate information may be gained concerning the 65,000,000 people living within the bounds of this great country.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 30.—

Mr. Plumb has introduced a resolution in the Senate which will enable its members to learn what they are voting for when they pass a tariff bill affecting the prices of most or all of the productions and importations of the United States. The present practice with tariff bills enables a committee inspired by the protected interests to force a bill through Congress without any consideration and which none but an expert can understand. Until the day that the bill is presented to the House it is shrouded in mystery. Then the party lash is applied. The desperate opposition of a few industries calls their particular cases into notice. A pretense is afforded for the airing of a little oratory and the bill passes. The members don't know what they have increased or decreased in duties in the long lists of tariff rates, and in a great part of the details of the bill the committee that drafted it are guilty of the same ignorance.

The resolution directs that the Finance committee report to the Senate, in connection with the tariff bill, a statement showing the duties levied under the present law, under the McKinley House bill, and under the bill it shall itself produce, in parallel columns for convenient comparason and examination. The committee is specially instructed that where it shall recommend a levy of duty not now provided for by law, or an increase of rate above that now imposed, to furnish the Senate the reasons therefore in each case in writing.

Mr. McKinley said his followers sought to gain fame and political capital by making a totally original tariff bill. To do that the rates were altered for every imported article. After four months of labor the change was made. But no reason could be given for a great many, if not most, of the alterations. In making them Mr. McKinley and the committee neither knew, nor did they take the trouble to learn, what the rates were under the present law. He acknowledged this repeatedly on the floor of the House of Congress when applied to for information. The prime object seemed to be a new and a McKinley high tariff bill. It was presented to the House with no comparative tables, and no reasons were given for the changes made, many of which would destroy flourishing industries, and others raising the tariff where the duties already produce a heavy revenue, and unnecessarily tax the people.

For example what reason was offered for raising the duty on copper, after companies were named in the House who made yearly profits as great as $6,000,000 on an investment on $1,500,000. Or on tin, that every family requires, though not a pound is produced in this country. The people of Kansas would like to hear the reasons why their smelting works should be dried up, and the market in Mexico for their bread stuffs destroyed, by new duties on silver lead ore, that already produces a big surplus revenue, and so on, ad infinitum.

On consideration of the resolution of the Senate, it was amended to add a column showing the equivalent ad valorem duty, another for cases where tariff is reduced, and the words "where practicable" added to the requirement of giving reasons for alterations. This last amendment is unfortunate as the committee will make its own construction of the word "practicable." But it is to be hoped that there are more in the Senate infused with the idea of Mr. Plumb to suffer certain manufactures "to fry their own fat" rather than have the duties higher, and with the frightful example of the House before it, and its increased facilities for information, it is to be hoped that the Senate will produce a tariff bill that will be free of a great deal of the injustice in that one, so wantonly passed by the House.

Having completed "the greatest effort of his life" Mr. McKinley is now preparing a silver bill. It is conservative in its tendencies and of the general terms as that adopted by the House caucus. He expects to pass it through the House by a special order before the Senate passes a silver bill, which he fears will be for free-coinage. He thinks that if a conservative is first passed by the House it will have a good effect in deterring the Senate from extreme courses.

The Naval appropriation bill has finally passed the Senate, including the provision for three heavily armoured vessels at a cost of $4,000,000 each. Quite a spirited discussion preceded the passage of this provision between Senators in favor of and opposed to a large navy Mr. Blair wished to amend by making the provision unavailable until England had been requested by the President to withdraw all her naval forces from American waters, and dismantle her naval stations in both North and South America and adjacent islands, and if the request was not complied with within a year to build a great navy. In reply to a question as to what answer he would expect from England he said that he thought it would be favorable.

Huntersville, W. Va.
June 5, 1890.

There are few nooks and corners of the masculine heart unknown to widows.

Her second husband formed a habit shortly after the wedding of not coming home until mornig at 2 or three o'clock.

Once, having forgotten his keys, he had to knock. She put her head out of the window and asked:

Who's there?"

"Me," was the ungrammatical reply.

"Oh; at first I thought it was someone else."

And now that man waits at home nightly and would seem to be waiting for Someone Else to call.—

Applicant(to country editor)—Do you want any help on your paper? Editor—What experience have you had?

Applicant—Have been a cowboy for three years and have assisted at a number of hangings.

Editor—All right; you may go on as critic and also take charge of the poetic department.

Mr. Hawbeck—You aint seen my son afore, have yer?

City Visitor—Why, no, Very likely boy, isn't he? Takes after his father.

Mr. Hawbeck—You bet he does, when he gets riled. Took after me four times 'round th' barn this mornin' 'cause spoke kind 'r irritated to him.

"Frank," said Mable, tenderly "doesn't it seem ages between Tuesday and Saturday night?"

"Yes, indeed," replied Frank, thoughtlessly, "Sometimes it seems as though pay day would never come."

"John," said the minister, "will you take this woman to be your wedded wife?" "Now, here, parson, what's the use of asking questions like that? Why do you suppose I am after; a divorce?"

Jinks—"That young lady may be a fine pianist, as you say, but there is no warmth to her touch."

Blinks—"I guess you didn't hear her play the 'Moonlight Symphony.'"

Jinks—"No; but I squeezed her hand."

First Steamboat Passenger—"There's a brass band playing on deck."

Second Steamboat Passenger—"I don't hear it."

F. S. P.—"Probably not; a dozen drummers can play a game of draw without being heard all over the ship."

Littleshort—"I'll call around Wednesday and fix up that account, Mr. Ostaway."

Tailor (severely)—"Very well, sir; I'll make a note of it."

Littleshort—"Good! Make it at ninety days and I'll sign it."

"I don't like Wagner's music." "Indeed! How?" "Because you call the composer 'Wagner,' instead of 'Vagner.'"

Vesey—"Why do you think Fulton dislikes living in New Jersey?"

Cortlandt—"Because every time he gets on the ferry-boat it makes him cross."

Hardbake—"I hear that chap Dryson is somewhat of an inventor."

Snarleigh—"Yes."

Hardbake—"What's he ever invented?"

Snarleigh—"Lies."

Guest(to head waiter)—"Is your name Tide?"

Waiter—"No, sir."

Guest—"Or Time?"

Waiter—"Not at All."

Guest—"Well, it ought to be one of them. You wait on no man."

"Well, I got there?" exclaimed Jaysmith, announcing a recent success. "Yes; with all four feet," replied Cumso.

"Johnny, what do you expect to do for a living when you get to be a man?"

"Well, I reckon I'll get married and board with by wife's pa."

"On the fence, there' is 'Wilson's Shoe Store.'"

"Well, if Wilson's Shoe tore, why don't he go and get it mended?"

Mr. Piexo—I's gettin' tired ob'd railroad persuasion, gennlemen. Mr. Renders—So's I. Mr. Rates—What's yo magnates a-growlin' 'bout? Mr. Piexo—A feller on d' train comin, down guv me a quahter wiv a hole into it, an' when I kicked, he took back'd quahter, an' tole me't use d' hole fer to burry maseff in.

He (making a party call)—I think party calls are great bores, don't you?

She (receiving)—Yes, indeed.

Drill Master—Eyes right! Raw Recruit—Humph! So's I!

A new cavern, discoved in Giles County, Va., is said to surpass in extent and beauty that of Luray.

No wine in the Chicago World's Fair! No spirits! No Beer! Nothing that can intoxicate except the eloquence of Governor Fifer! That is the present programme, and a true temperance programme it is.

The efforts to secure a charter for the Louisiana Lottery in North Dakota are being renewed with great energy. The State is swarming with agents of the lottery, and it is said that $5,000,000 will be expended with a view to securing the election of a Governor and Legislature favorable to the scheme.

Alfred T. Ferrine, who is said to have invented the gatling gun, and to have received $3,000 for his idea, has just died in Cincinnati in straightened circumstances. He was at one time worth $150,000, but fired it all away in the great battle of Speculation.

Mrs. Cole, of Fredericksburg, Va., made a pointed observation some days ago. It was a tiny projection from her side, that of a needle that she had swallowed, she says, forty years ago, and which has caused her no pain or inconvenience since.

A Bible has just been rediscovered in the Vatican library which is in Hebrew. It is supposed to be the oldest in the world, and is valued at $100,000. In the year 1512, the Jews of Venice offered Pope Julius II its weight in gold for it, but though he was financially straitened just then he refused the offer.

Assuming the estimate that the population of the United States is now 65,000,000, the increase this century "is almost as great as that of the entire population of Spain, as great as that of Mexico and Canada together, or as Belgium, the Netherlands and Portugal combined." No wonder that problems of government have confronted us rapidly.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 6.—Tariff, silver and politics are the topics of Congressional consideration at present, and are likely to remain the subjects of attention for sometime to come. Some —— started a report that Congress would take a recess from July 1, to Oct. 1, but that is extremely improbable, as it would be difficult to keep a quorum here during the autumn season.

The solicitude of the members concerning their re-election is of more importance to many of them than the business before Congress; while those who don't expect to be re-elected will be altogether too indigerent about results to return before the next regular session. It is the general opinion now among Congressmen, and those best posted on the subject, that Congress will not adjourn before September 1.

The republicans of the House have determined to take the lead on the silver question, which the Senate has been wrestling with to no purpose, all this session. They will pass under suspension of the rules what is known as the "Cannon bill," which provides for the redemption of silver certificates in lawful money or bullion. It is expected to be somewhat amended to meet the views of the President. The extreme silver men complain that a good many republicans are deterred from taking a bold stand for free coinage, by their desire to stand well with the White House. They are beginning to feel a sense of the futility of passing a free coinage bill, now that it is not doubted that the president would interpose his veto. The constitution authorizes and encourages the President to recomend measures to Congress, and it seems that this would be an excellent time to obey this constitutional injunction in regard to the silver question. He fought shy of the subject in his message but said "at a later day I may communicate further with Congress on this subject." A message from him now would probably expedite a settlement of the long debated question.

Many of the extreme silver men are still confident that they will be able to pass a bill embodying their views, including free coinage in the Senate, but are doubtful of its passage in the House. They say that republicans in both branches of Congress are more concerned about retaining pleasant relations with the administration and the distribution of patronage, than settling a great economic question.

One of the ultra silver men has said that they intended to make an effort in the Senate to have the certificates made legal tender and further amend the pending measure as to make the bullion aggregate 4,500,000 ounces, instead of that many dollars worth monthly. They would follow this by offering a free coinage bill as a substitute. Should it pass, they will use their best endeavors to have the House follow their example, and take the chances of the Presidents veto. If the motion fails they will content themselves with the bill as amended.

The House republicans are more conservative and will endeavor to pass a bill of such tendencies, before the Senate can come to vote on the subject.

As for the tariff the republicans cannot agree. The McKinley and Allison divisions are as irreconcilable as were those of Randall and Morrison in the Democratic House of other days. Even the committee of the Senate that has the McKinley bill under examination is divided against itself, and will in the end substitute a measure totally different. This substitute bill, it is believed will be modeled on the lines of the Allison bill of two years ago, except that where changes occur, the duties will be lowered and not increased. It will probably be passed sometime in August. It is expected that when the Senate bill reaches the house the republicans will vote non-concur. This will send it to a committee of conference when the different items will be fought over indefinitely. The more prominent Senate democrats dont expect a tariff bill to be passed, and believe that the republicans will pursue this course in order to occupy a negative position in the Congressional elections this autumn. When the campaign begins they can say that their friends who are dissatisfied with certain items in the McKinley Bill that it is not proposed to pass that measure, but the Senate bill. A similar argument will be made to those objecting to items in the Senate bill.

The conference on the Army Appropriation report, included a recommendation that no intoxicating drinks should be supplied in canteens, or trader's stores in states and territories where prohibition exists. This provision was adopted by the Senate; 35 yeas, 8 nays.

There is no probability that the Senate bills for the admission of Idaho and Wyoming will be considered this session. The silver and tariff bills, and National election bill will have to be disposed of before any attention is given to state hood bills, but it is possible that political considerations may induce the republicans to admit the new states next session.

—On Tuesday, the 10th inst., S. L. Gibson, Geo. S. McNeel, Wm. Cleek, H. M. Lockridge and J. C. Arbogast, who were appointed commissioners by the Circuit Court, met in Hunterrville to assess the damages sustained by Wm. Curry and others on account of the new road and bridge proposed to be built opposite town. The County Court was represented by the Prosecuting Attorney, L. M. McClintic, and C. F. Moore appeared in behalf of Mr. Curry. The Commissioners proceeded to view the ground and to hear evidence introduced by the defendants; whereupon they made their report, allowing Mrs. Elizabeth McGlaughlin $20.00 the trustees of the grave yard $20.00 and Wm. Curry $250. Inasmuch as these sums are larger than the sums offered by the County Court, the Court will have to pay the costs of the proceedings.

Edray Items.

N. A. Williams & son are holding forth here preserving youthful beauty and doing it well.

Mess. S. B. and G. P. Moore are back from Green Bank, and report that they had a very pleasant time at the Musical Association held there last Friday and Saturday.

Mr. J. T. Black is in this district looking after the work and interests of a Farmer's Alliance for this vicinity.

This county cannot and will not "boom" until land owners show a different disposition from that now prevailing. The damages claimed are too high, when private property is to be dedicated to public use, and when mechanics want a lot none can be had for love or cash, about our villages.

Marlinton Pickings.

The pleasant and commodious house of John Poage, Esq., near Poage's Lane was consumed by fire Friday night May 30th. The inmates barely escaped with their lives. Very little of the furniture was saved. Mr. Poage had just returned from marketing his wool and most of the family supplies were consumed along with fifty dollars in money. The fire is believed to be of incendiary origin, as there seems to be no other way to account for it, that is satisfactory. Loss about $1,200.

Mr. Kenny Moore a very worthy young man of this vicinity was seriously injured in Webster Co., a week or two since. He was occupied in driving logs, and in the attempt to break a jam, his leg was fractured in two places the intermediate bone splitting from fracture to fracture. Soon after this, he was seized with mumps and anxious fears are trembling his friends as to the result of this complicated casualty.

Dunmore Doings.

Warm and dry.

A. N. Jackson, has returned from Huttonsville, and will start for Ronceverte to morrow.

Miss Birdie Moore, of Huttonsville is visiting here.

Miss Ollie Cackley will be home this week from Richmond.

Cols. John Driscol and C. E. Bird, of Ronceverte, spent last Sunday at Dunmore. They also attended the singing convention at Green Bank on last Friday and Saturday. We like to see men like those gentlemen. They have hearts as large as a bake oven. They contributed for the organ at Green Bank $20.00 and for the organ at Dunmore $7.00. They never stand back for a good cause.

The Musical Association was largely attended and well represented. We expect a big boom in singing this summer, and hope that all may take part in the good work.

Singing every Wednesday night at Dunmore, conducted by Prof. J. A. Taylor, every Thursday night at Green Bank, conducted by Prof. G. D. Oliver and every Sunday at 2 p. m., at X Roads School house, conducted by Prof. C. B. Swecker, assisted by Miss Alice Rayburn, also singing at the upper end of the county conducted by Profs. O. W. Ruckman and C. C. Arbogast.

Our merchant Mr. R. L. Nottingham will have two wagons this week, with goods.

"Uncle" Sam Sutton as he is called by all who know him, has a heifer 13 months old that has been giving milk every since she was 9 months old. She is a natural milker.

Several rattle snakes have been killed this hot weather.

There were 46 scholars enrolled at the Sunday school at X Roads last Sunday evening.

Everybody should go to Huntersville next Monday to hear ex-Governor Wilson speak.

Auctioneer Swecker will attend court next week.

TRAVELER.

A Farmer's Alliance At Locust.

A number of citizens of Locust W. Va., Pocahontas County assembled at the Droop school house on the 5th day of June, 1890, for the purpose of discussing the propriety of organizing themselves together as a body known as the Farmer's Alliance.

On motion Mr. Thomas F. Callison was elected temporary chairman and Edwin L. Beard Sec'y pro tem. The Chairman called upon Mr. J. T. Black the agent for the State of W. Va., to explain the object of the meeting which he did in a very able and satisfactory manner, after which Mr. Henry N. Hannah was elected Treasurer pro tem.

There being nineteen male members enrolled—a sufficient number present—were organized into an alliance to be known as Locust Alliance. Where upon the following officers were duly elected:

Edwin L. Beard, Pres.; Richard Callison, Vice-Pres.; Henry N. Hannah, Secy.; Wm. H. Callison, Treasurer; Thos. F. Callison, Lecturer; Jacob W. Beard, Asst.-Lecturer; Mason Williams, Door-keeper; Jonathan Cochran, Serg't-at-Arms; Business Agent,——.

On motion Thos. F. Callison and L. S. Cochran, were elected delegates to attend the organization of the County alliance of Huntersville on June 21st, 1890.

EWIN L. BEARD, Sec'y pro tem.

COMMENCEMENTS.

The Hillsboro Training School and M. & F. Academy.

The third annual Commencement of the Hillsboro Training school, conducted by the Misses Shearer, took place last Thursday night in the presence of one of the largest audiences ever assembled in Hillsboro.

The exercises were opened by prayer by Rev. Christopher Sydenstricker followed by a number of excellent Recitations, Declamations and many things too numerous to mention separately.

Among the best things of the evening were a Declamation "False and True Glory," by Mr. Jasper Auldridge. "The Bell drill," by 16 boys and girls. "Stretching Things 13," rec. by Miss Jennie Bolten and Master Marshall Isabel. "A Name," a speech by Mr. Norval Clark. "The Lost Hymn," a rec. by Miss L. D. Marshall. "Josiah Allen's Wife at A. T. Stewart's Store," select reading by Miss Annie McNeel. "The Death Bed of Benedict Arnold," dec. by Mr. Gus Eskridge. "Seven living cities claimed a Homer dead Through which a living Homer begged his bread," essay by Miss Addie Williams.

"The May Pole Drill," was another delightful feature of the evening. Eight ribbons were wound around the Pole so as to form checks, and arrows were shot through eight floral triangles, and finally a mark was placed upon the stage and the young lady who hit the centre was to receive a handsome boquet, which was presented to Miss Lillie Hull, of Edray, she being the only one of the eight who hit the centre. The fair marksmen carried bows and arrows handsomely decked with ribbon.

The address by Rev. C. Sydenstricker was very good, as was acknowledged by hearty applause as he took his seat.

The music on this occasion was very fine and consisted of marches, songs and duets. The National song, a quartette, by Misses Rose and Needa Shearer and Mess. Gus Eskridge and Jasper Auldridge, was given up by the large audience to be the best thing of its kind we have ever had here. One and all did jutice to their teachers, and showed careful training and forethought.

THE HILLSBORO M. & F. ACADEMY.

The entertainment given by Prof. Hankla at the close of the M. & F. Academy, on the evening of May 30th, was also a most enjoyable affair and consisted of many good recitations, declamations. Dialogues, &c. All of the scholars acquitted themselves creditably. Among the things deserving special mention were the declamations by Mess. Winters and Summers McNeel, Clarence Overholt, Willie Wysong and Frank Hill, and recitation by Miss Sallie Hamilton. The dialogues were all amusing and caused much merriment. All expressed themselves as well pleased. The music was furnished by Misses Mary I. McNeel and Annie Wallace and Mess. G. F. Crummett and Mott Wallace assisted in the singing.

"Why are you fumbling in my overcoat pocket?" he asked, as he glanced from his paper.

"I'm looking for a letter," replied his wife.

"Why, my dear, you don't suppose—"

"No, I don't," she interrupted, "I'm looking for the one I gave you to mail last week."

Farmer (hiring help at Castle Garden)—"Pat, if you want to work for me, I'll give you $25 a month and your board."

Patrick O'Flynn (just landed)—"Faix, an' is that same the highest rate of wages they be payin' in this counthry?"

Farmer (facetiously)—"Well, they're paying about $15 a day in Congress."

Patrick—"Thin, begorra, oi'll go to Congriss."

Generous to A Fault.

A friend sends us the following story which may be a little gray with the frost of time, though we do not recall seeing in print, we insert it, anyhow, with the thought that "there's nothing new under the sun."

A young gentleman and a young lady were attending a wedding.—their own wedding, by the way. After the ceremony was over, the groom, in a business-like manner, asked the minister for a statement of account. The parson told him the law allowed him three dollars. The happy groom said, in a generous tone of voice, handing him a fifty-cent piece: "this, with what the law allows you, will make it three dollars and a half.

Time Works Wonders.

One of our nouveaux riches, who was desirous of having his father's portrait sketched, went to the painter and made known his desire. The artist asked to see him who was to be painted, but was informed that it was impossible, as the old gentleman had taken up his permanent residence in the cemetery.

"Well, you have a photograph of him, haven't you?" was the next question.

"Got a photograph of him? Well I guess I wouldn't be a comin' 'round here to get his portrait painted if I had a picture of him already," was the reply.

At that moment a portrait of Moses that was hanging by the studio caught his eye, and he said:

"Who's that?"

"That's a picture of Moses," was the reply.

"Well, if you could paint that old fellow, who lived centuries ago, I don't see why you can't paint my father, who died only a few years ago."

The artist immediately seized upon his prey, as he said:

"Well, come around here in a week, and I'll have your father's portrait painted."

The artist for the following seven days busied himself in constructing an old man after his own ideas, and when the customer arrived at the studio he disclosed the result of his ingenuity and said:

"There sir is your father."

The Croesus was amazed. He backed aghast at the picture and only found breath to say:

"Lord, how the old man has changed."

Ed Van Metere, an educated Sioux Indian has been admitted to practice law before the Dakota circuit courts.

On Sunday last Rev. Sam Jones commensed a series of meeting in Richmond, to be continued three times daily until the 29th inst. The first meetings were attended by from 9,000 to 10,000 people, on each occasion, embracing the best of the citizens of the city.

Preparations are being made to take out a section of the big Red wood for the purpose of exhibition at the World's Fair in 1893. This will be the largest section of any big tree measures ninety feet in circumference and thirty feet in diameter.

The President's wife, Mrs. Harrison, has been presented by a syndicate of friends, with an elegant cottage at Cape May, which she will occupy during the present summer. She is a most accomplished and charming lady, and the gift a recognition of her popularity.

The population of Ireland continues to decline, and appears to have dropped some 50,000 in number during the past year. The lowest point of this present century has now been reached. Its zenith was in 1845, when there were 8,250,000. The estimate for to-day is 3,500,000.

In the year 1700 there was but one newspaper in the United States. In 1870 there were 5,871; this year there are 16,310, and the total for the United States and Canada being 17,107. In 1870 there were but 14,000 periodicals printed in the whole world. Now, however, there are in the United States alone 12,791 weeklies, 1,998 monthlies and 1,584 dailies.

GOV. WILSON AT HUNTERSVILLE.

On Monday last one of the largest audiences that has greeted a public speaker in this county for many years assembled at the court house to hear Gov. Wilson.

The Governor was at his best and held the large audience with marked attention for two hours and a half, while he addressed himself particular to the condition of our farmers and clearly pointed out the remedy for their wrongs. His speech was based on facts and figures that could not be gainsayed, was logical throughout, and delivered with that forceful eloquence peculiar to himself.

The general impression was good; and although he said not a word against any one else, and spoke for the party rather than himself, his speech made him many personal friends beside strengthening the Democratic ranks.

The Gov. is a charming man in his personal intercourse; and while sufficiently dignified, he is easily approached and freely commingles with the people. Many of our citizens were persuaded that we could not do better than to send him to the next Congress.

Democratic Executive Committee.

The Democratic Executive Committee, at its meeting in Huntersville, on Monday last, determined to to hold a primary election on the second Tuesday in September for the purpose of selecting a County ticket.

It was also ordered that on Saturday, July 26 a mass meeting be held in each District of the County for the purpose of selecting delegates to the State, Congressional and Senatorial Conventions and also to the joint-convention held by the counties of Pocahontas and Webster for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the legislature: Each District to appoint three delegates to each of the foregoing convention.

The chairman of the Committee was instructed to confer with the executive committee of Webster county, and, if concurred in by said Committee of Webster, to call a joint convention of the two counties to meet at Huntersville on the second Saturday in August for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the Legislature.

Inasmuch as it is conceded that Pocahontas county is entitled to the candidate for the State Senate and for the Legislatures, it is recommended that the delegates from this county to each of these two conventions before going into said conventions determine among themselves who is the county's favorite candidate and enter said conventions with but one candidate and thus give the support of the County to the man preferred by the majority.

It was also determined that all persons, whatever their previous party affiliations may have been, shall be allowed to vote at the primary election, provided they pledge themselves to support the nominees of said election when they vote at the general election.

The committee adjourned to meet on call of the Chairman.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 13.—

Hon. Commisioner Raum of the Pension Bureau, is to follow the inglorious retreat of Corporal Tanyer.

A resolution has been filed in the House directing the committee on Invalid Pensions to inquire into charges that have been filed with the President relative to the conduct of the Pension Bureau. The charges against the commissioner are scandalous almost beyon belief to those unacquainted with the process by which pensions are obtained. For one gifted with ordinary intelligence there is no necessity for any lawer, or mediator, in the prosecution of a pension cla m. The blanks showing the evidence required are furnished direct, on application, from the department. There is no occassion for a lawyer unless the applicant is unable to write. The idea of having an attorney here to look after the clients interests is a mistake that brings large returns to the pockets of the so colled pension attorneys, but their clients derive benefit for the expense.

To employ an attorney here is simply an additional expense to an applicant for pension, who pays all the law allows for the simple sake of letting the correspondence with department pass through his attorney's hands. Then it is usually necessary to apply to some Justice of the Peace or poor local lawyer, to have the affidavits of witnesses drawn who charges specially for each occassion what he could do for nothing, if the Washington lawyer didn't hold the case. The advantage of the Washington attorney is not to be seen, and he is regarded in his true light by those acquainted with his methods. That is as a confidence man who preys upon the ignorance of the old soldier. He is thoroughly despised by reputable lawyers, but like the quack doctors, he learned a scheme to make money and flourishes. Tanner dropped on to the trick while he conducted the Pension Bureau, and since his expulsion has been practicing the tricks learned there. In an interview this week in one of the Washington papers, in a ebullition of joy he announced that he had made $100,000 in the last year as pension attorney, and expected his yearly income to soon reach the figures $400,000. This opportunity might be a great temptation to whom it be presented, but the poor ignoramuses that pay for it ought to open their eyes. Since his exposure people begin to wonder why the President ever appointed Gen. Raum to the office. At the time he was practically at head of the firm of Green B. Raum & Co., pension attorneys. The other members of the firm, were his sons, John and Green B. Jr. Upon the installatment of his father into office Green B., was appointed Chief of the Appointment Division of the Bureau, and John was left in charge of the office where he has continued to do a flourishing business for the firm. He has been furnished in advance with decisions from the department, which he conveyed to his patrons in solicitation of their claims. He has had his cases made special and called out of the regular order at pleasure, with no reason to offer but the inherent prerogative of the firm.

On the night of March 15, 1890, Miss Grace Gudley, of Amboy, Ill., retired for the night as usual. She has been sweetly sleeping ever since. Her breathing is natural; her face retains its fresh beauty and brightness. Medical men at home and abroad have been called to consult over and prescribe for her case, but all to no effect. She was sleeping soundly at last account, with no indication of a change in her condition.

It is stated that the Armours, the great meat packers and dealers of Chicago, last year killed 1,200,000 hogs, 600,000 cattle and 250,000 sheep—$5,000,000 worth more than during the year previous. They emyloyed 6,000 men, to whom they paid $3,000,000—or an average of $500 a piece for the year, or $1.66⅔ cents per day. There are several other slaughtering and packing establishments in the West—notably in Chicago and Kansas City—each of which does a large business annually.

The following persons were appointed delegates to the County Alliance to be organized at Huntersville on Saturday, 21st: M. D. McGlaughlin W. H. Grose, H. T. White and C. R. Moore.

A CARD.

Since announcing myself a candidate for Clerk of the County and Circuit Courts of Pocahontas county, I have ascertained that a majority of the people of this county are in favor of electing two Clerks, a different person to each office, and not having the same person hold both offices, as at present. Not caring to antagonize the wishes of the people in any way, I have withdrawn as a candidate for Clerk of the Circuit Court and will run for the County Court Clerkship only. This will give me an opportunity to devote my attention to the one office.

Respectfully,
S. L. BROWN.

Wayside Notes.

For exquisite loveliness of natural scenery, and promising attractive families, the community associated with Liberty church, near Green Bank cannot be easily surpassed.

An incident of recent and rather rare occurrence anywhere, is worthy of special notice and commendation.

Quite a number of the young people have been interested in repairing and furnishing Liberty Meeting House, just because it was a building devoted to the worship of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. The young gentlemen, one of them a workman of more than ordinary skill for one so young, met and repaired the vestibule in a very substancial manner, erected spacious upping platforms, and fixed hitching places, giving their labor for days as a free gift.

The young ladies have furnished an organ of superior excellence, a lamp of 324 candle power and renovated the pulpit, and have more improvements in prospect, all too for Christ, no other motive apparant.

Twenty minutes past two o'clock, Monday afternoon, June the 9th, little Clifford, the youngest child of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. L. Brown, was borne away to be with Jesus, who loves him. Though his sufferings were heart-reuding to his parents and greatly attached sisters and brothers, still they are greatly sustained by the consolations of christian faith, so the writer learns from a very touching letter written by his father, "Little did I think, while listening to your sermon last Sunday week, on the death of Mr. and Mrs. Lightner's little one, that we would be so soon called to mourn a similar loss, but such is our lot. Poor little son he was pure, he had no sins to atone for, he needed no preparations, he was prepared to go at any time, so we feel and think."

May the loving Father remember all of the afflicted over in that community, and make them glad according to days wherein He has afflicted them.

County Court vs. Wm. Curry and others to condemn land for public roads, report of the Commissioners' confirmed.

A good Story comes from the Pension office at Washington, via the Chicago News: "Some time ago a claimant for a pension submitted an affidavit from a physician at Duluth, testifying to his disability, and to the fact that it was the result of his service during the war. Recently the case came up, when a letter was written to the postmaster of Duluth asking whether the doctor was a regular practioner and a man of truth and varacity. The reply came in due time, in which the postmaster said that he had spent his entire life with the physician in question, and believed him to be a man of good character. During his youth, unlike George Washington, he had told some falsehoods, but had been soundly whipped for them and had learnt better; therefore in his old age, he was able to stick to facts as well as any citiezn. Then he signed his name, which was the same as that of the physician, and it appears that the postmaster and the physician are one and the same person."

The Potter's Field, at Philadelphia, is to give up 6,000 dead bodies to be cremated. Cremation, may not in this generation or the next become the popular mode of disposing of the bodies of the dead, but the day is coming when sanitary consideration will popularize the crematory, and the custom of encenderazing the dead become the universal custom.

The two wealthiest women in Philadelphia, both widows, are said to be Mrs. Thomas H. Powers and Mrs. Thomas A. Scott. It is stated that they are worth between $6,000,000 and $8,000,000 each.

Miss Poesy—You would never be an editor, would you, Lyric.

Lyric Verse—Oh, no; but why do you ask?

Miss Poesy—They're are such a coarse, horrid, contemptable set of creatures. Do you know that just after we were engaged, I wrote to an editor, over an assumed name, of course, and asked him how I could best show my love for you.

L. V.—Well?

Miss P.—Well, the reply came out in the "Answers to Correspondents" column. He said that I might tell my mother she need never show her face 'round our future home.

L. V.—Horrors.

Miss Poesy—And I might bestow my income unreservedly upon you, and take in sewing to supply my own necessities. Lyric, dear, (with a rising sob,) I used to have ambitions for you, and want you to lead a literary and intellectual life; but now I would rather you should be a butcher than an editor. There's some refinement about butchering.

L. V. (with pent up emotion)—That's so!

A cousin from a Western ranch is visiting the Bellinghams, of Boston.

The Cousin (at lunch)—Them stuffed olives is the most all fired elegant things I ever got my teeth intil."

Baby Bellingham (aged two, in a whisper)—"Mamma, this man is literally dreadful. Suppose any of our friends should see that use of the knife. And if he persists in his criminally ungrammatical language, I am absolutely certain I shall have an attack of nervous prostration."

"What are we waiting on, conductor?" asked a passenger from Chicago, when the train came to standstill.

"We are waiting on the track," replied the conductor, who was a Boston man.

Chicago Tribune: The railway accident had been a terrible one, and one of the men who were carrying the thirty-seventh victim up the embankment said with strong feeling:

"Somebody will have to pay dearly for all this!"

The mangled passenger opened his eyes and glared at the speaker.

"The company is not to blame," he said feebly; "this is a dispensation of Providence!"

He was the attorney for the road.

Mabel—The man who marries me must have a good big bank account."

Ethel—You don't mean to say you will marry solely for money?"

Mabel—No, not exactly; but if any one swears he loves me I shall require a deposit merely as an evidence of good faith."

MR. & MRS. BOWSER.

An expressman brought up a small jag of lumber the other afternoon and left it at the barn, and when Mr. Bowser came home I mentioned the fact, and asked what he intended to do with it.

"It's for screen doors for the front doors," he replied.

"Carpenter coming up to make them?"

"Haven't engaged any."

"Mr. Bowser, you are not going to try to make them yourself?"

"There won't be any trying about it. I shall proceed to make and hang them."

"I'm afraid you can't do it. It's a nice piece of joiner work to make a screen door, especially one for the front of the house."

"I am well aware of that," he said as he stroked his chin in a complacent way. "Haven't I got about $50 worth of tools? Don't I know how to handle them?"

"I—I wish you had given your order at the shop, as other folks do."

"I'll be hanged if I pay any $8 for a pair of doors when I can make 'em for $3! You are always dead set against anything I undertake!"

"Mr. Bowser, you can't make a screen door. You can't hang one. Don't blame me when the failure comes."

"Blame you! Are you getting crazy? If those doors are not a success you won't hear a word of fault from me—not a peep. I was thinking of ordering them, but being you have stuck your nose up so high, I'll make 'em now just to show you that I can do it."

And the next morning he put on an old suit and went out to the barn and before 9 o'clock he had measured four different times for those doors. At last he got the dimensions to suit, and I heard him sawing off the strips. About 11 o'clock I went out and found the stuff all cut to lengths, and Mr. Bowser was making half mortices at the end.

"Aren't our front doors higher than this?" I asked as I picked up one of the side pieces.

"Haven't you any housework to see to?" he brusquely replied.

"You've got 'em a foot too short."

"Oh, have I, eh? Some folk's eyes are better than a carpenter's rule."

I went back into the house, but it wasn't long before I saw him sneaking around to the front with one of the pieces. I watched him as he tried it, and it was all of the twelve inches short. Mr. Bowser scratched his ear, growled like a bear, and looked as foolish as a boy caught in a harvest apple tree. Ten minutes later he was at the telephone ordering more stuff.

"Were they too short?" I asked as he hung up the trumpet.

"N—no, but I thought I'd get heavier stuff, he mumbled as he shot out doors.

The stuff came up after dinner, and it was about 2 o'clock in the afternoon when he put one of the frames together and stood it up in the door. I went out, and as he began to smile with satisfaction I said:

"Mr. Bowser, that door is squeegawed."

"Squeegawed! Squeegawed! What does that stand for in the back counties?"

"Your door is wider at the bottom than at the top."

"It can't be!"

"Just your own eyes will convince you. There's an inch difference!"

"Never. I'll bet you a million dollars there isn't a hair's breadth."

I ran for my tapeline and soon proved that the difference was over an inch.

"Oh, well, I can fix that in a moment," he said, but it was 9 o'clock that evening before he came in. Then he had pounded one of his fingers with the hammer, run a tack into his thumb, got a bad hurt from a brad-awl, and half a dozen times during the night he groaned out in his sleep about mortises, tenons, hinges, springs, etc., and once I heard him exclaim:

"Fit! Why, if they don't fit I'll knock the infernal old house down!"

"It was 10 o'clock next forenoon when I went out to the barn. He had a door covered with the wire cloth, and proudly called my attention to it.

"Which is the outside of the door?" I asked:

"Why, the side this way, of course."

"Then you've tacked the cloth on the inside!"

"That's where it belongs."

"You never saw it there, Mr. Bowser—never! And look at the way you have tacked the stuff on. It's humped up in dozen different places, because you pulled it askew."

"There isn't one bump—not the sign of a bump! I'll give any man a billion dollars to make a better job of it! All that door needs now is painting.

"But don't they paint the frames before they tack the cloth on? How are you going to paint the inside of the frame?"

"Don't you worry yourself about this job. Mrs. Bowser, I wasn't born alongside of a huckleberry marsh!"

But after I had gone away he tore off the wire and painted the frame, and next morning he covered the other. That night Mr. Bowser kicked around in his sleep in the most awful manner, and at about 2 o'clock in the morning he suddenly sat up in the bed and exclaimed:

"Squeegawed! I'll bet you four hundred thousand billion dollars against a cent that they are as plumb as a rule."

Mr Bowser had been at work an hour next morning before I went out. He had the doors at the front, and he seemed to have some trouble about hanging them.

"You see what you've done, don't you?" I asked after a survey of the scene.

"I don't believe I'm either near-sighted or color-blind," he replied.

"Well, you've got one door wrong side up to begin with."

"H-how?"

"Look at the panels and see. Then you have been trying to hang one to swing in and the other to swing out."

"I have, eh? That shows all you know about it. I'm simply fitting the screens so they will shut tight."

Just about noon he got a hang on both doors, and as I look at them from the hall I had to sit down on on the floor and laugh. They didn't meet in the center within two inches and each was half an inch short at top and bottom. He had also hung them with the cloth on the inside. Just then a neighbor came along and turned in to the steps. After looking at the doors for half a minute in great astonishment, he queried:

"Something just from Paris, Bowser?"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, you've got a new idea in screen doors. I suppose the space at the bottom is for bugs, that the top for mosquitoes, and the center for flies. I see you have left the frame exposed. They will make capital roosting places for horse-flies and pinch-bugs. Did you do this job?"

"Y-yes."

"Well, if I had a girl 10 years old who couldn't beat it I'd make her go barefot all summer."

"I didn't make these doors for your house, sir."

"Thank heaven for that! Bowser, you're a brick—a soft brick! I'll come up this evening with a band and serenade those doors!"

"When the neighbor had gone I suddenly felt the back end of the house lift up. It was Mr. Bowser pulling those screen doors off. He couldn't even wait to take the screws out of the hinges. They came off in detachments, and the pieces were flung into the back yard. When he had finished he came in and said:

"Mrs. Bowser, I want to have a talk with you—a very serious talk!"

"But didn't I tell you how it would be?"

"Never! You encouraged me to go ahead, and to please a whim of yours I've lost three days time, pounded myself all over, spent $6 in cash and been made a butt of ridicule! Mrs. Bowser, this is the limit—the finis—the end! Make out a list of what furniture you want, and let us agree on the alimony!"

A Lonely Heart.

A little old woman, wrinkled and bent, and dressed in rusty black, with a strip of limp crepe dangling from her shabby bonnet, came into the office of a great daily paper.

"You're the editor, be you?" she asked of the man who looked up from his desk as she entered.

"Yes'm," he replied briefly, but not unkindly. "What can I do for you?"

"Well, I—I—I've brung a little piece I'd like to have printed in the paper. I writ it myself and I don't know as you can make it all out it's so long since I handled a pen, but I'd like mightily to have it printed. It's about my little grandson that—died."

Her voice died away to a whisper at the last word and she wiped her dim eyes on a corner of her shawl before she added:

"He took scarlet fever and didn't live but four days and he'd never been sick a day before in his life, and he was the very picture of health. Here's a photograft I've got of him that I wouldn't take the world for now."

She laid on the editor's desk a card photograph of a sunny-faced boy of about five years.

"That was taken a year ago and it looks just as he always did, and he died with that same look on his face—dear little soul! I know he's better off, still it's awful hard to give him up. His ma and pa are most crazy. That's why I writ the piece, I thought it might mebbe be some comfort to 'em."

She laid several pages of cheap note paper covered with cramped and angular writing in blue ink.

"It's some po'try I made up 'bout him," she said. "It ain't very good, I know; some of the lines don't rhyme very good and lots of the words ain't spelled right, but I reckoned you could fix that up all right. I'd agree to take three extry copies of the paper if it was published."

"I am very sorry," said the editor, as he looked at page after page of verses, "but we don't publish anything more than the mere announcement of death."

"Oh, don't you? I didn't know. I've seen po'try pieces about the dead in papers sometimes, although I don't know as I ever have in this one. I'd be willing to pay to have it printed, but I ain't got a cent in the world. I walked all the way here. I don't mind so much myself, but I know it'd please his pa to see the piece in print. He was so wrapped up in Johnie. But, then, all of us was, for that matter—the dear, dear little fellow!"

She drew a limp cotton handkerchief from her pocket and wiped her eyes as she said:

"I'll take the piece and see if I can git it printed some place else—to please his pa, you know. He was the only child and, unless you've laid away your own flesh an' blood, you've no idee of how turrible it is to have a little life that go out jist when its gittin' more precious an' interesting ev'ry day. Its been mighty hard for me, his old grandma, even when I know it won't be but a little while till I'll be with him agin.

"Well, I'll have to go now. I'm sorry 'bout the piece, but I ain't blamin' you none. Of course you have to go by the rules of the paper. No, thank ye, you needn't help me down stairs. I kin git down alone. But it's kind in you to offer to help me. Yes, yes, I know you'd put the piece in the paper if you could, I ain't blamin' you none. It was silly in me, I know, but I never stopped to think but what ev'ry body'd be interested in our dear little Johnnie as we was. Good bye sir," and she went slowly out, a weak, pathetic little figure, her eyes blinded with tears and her heart aching with loneliness and longing for smiles and kisses and loving words of the little boy that died.

A Few Things Not to Do.

The Farmville Journal culls from a scrapt book the following precepts which are of general and are given for the benefit of whom they may concern:

If you want to keep a town from thriving, don't build any more houses than you can conveniently occupy yourself.

If you should accidentally have an empty building and any one wants to rent it, ask them three times its value.

Demand a Shylock price for every foot of land God has given you stewardship over.

Turn a cold shoulder to every mechanic and business man who seeks to make his home with you.

Look at every newcomer with a scowl.

Fail to advertise in support of your newspaper, that people abroad may not know whether business is going on or not.

Wrap yourself up in coat of impious selfishness.

There is no more effectual way to retard the growth of a town than actions like these.

She: "Indeed, it's not an easy thing for a girl to get a husband." He: "Why, a pretty girl can make her choice of four out of every five men she meets." She: "But it's the fifth that she want."

"Mamma," said Johnny, can anybody hear with their mouth?"

"No child I don't think they can," replied the ungrammatical mother.

"Then mamma what made Mr. Jones tell sister he wanted to tell her something and put his lips to her mouth instead of her ear?"

The mother did not question Johnny, but turned her attention to Mr. Jones, and that worthy made it all right by the proper explanations.

Mary Anderson, the American actress, was married in London, on the 17th, to Antonia Navarro, of New York.

A census enumerator in Richmond, Va., has found a colored woman named Martha Gray who had thirty-seven children since 1868. She has given birth to triplets six times, to twins six times and to seven others singly. She is now living with her third husband, and of the thirty-seven children but one survives.

In the good old days before the war the Southern blacks used to say that in the next world the whites would be the servants, but their idea of heaven has begun on earth, as a rich colored man of Galveston, with a fine house in the best part of the city employs only white servants.

Representative W. L. Wilson, of West Virginia, on June 14 delivered an address before the literary societies of William Sewell college, of Liberty, Mo. While there he was waited upon by the committee on nomination of the board of curators of the State University and tendered the presidency of the State University. He has, as yet, made no answer to the proposition. He is too valuable a Member of the House to be spared.—National Democrat.

The defalcation of State Treasurer Archer, of Maryland, ascertained by a committee appointed to examine into the matter, gives the sum at $132,401.25; the disposition of all which, except $10,000 in bonds, is accounted for. The funds were appropriated to paying off personal indebtedness, running back to the time when he represented the 2nd Maryland district in Congress. He was liberal with party workers and popular with the boys who run the machine, and to that may be traced the commencement of his troubles and his crimes.

A CARD.

Since announcing myself a candidate for Clerk of the County and Circuit Courts of Pocahontas county, I have ascertained that a majority of the people of this county are in favor of electing two Clerks, a different person to each office, and not having the same person hold both offices, as at present. Not caring to antagonize the wishes of the people in any way, I have withdrawn as a candidate for Clerk of the Circuit Court and will run for the County Court Clerkship only. This will give me an opportunity to devote my attention to the one office.

Respectfully,
S. L. BROWN.

LARGE BEAR KILLED.—Mr. Edward Hall, of Hightown, while out hunting last week in Allegheny mountain killed the largest bear that has been killed in that section for a number of years. When he first saw the animal he was some distance from him, but being armed with a Winchester, he fired at the bear and wounded him. This slight wound infuriated the animal very much, and he reared upon his hind feet and started for his enemy. Ed. stood his ground like one out of a thousand would have done, and as the bear approached he gave him full benefit of the contents of seven Winchester cartridges, No 44. Six of the shots did not check the bear's progress, and when the seventh one was fired the bear was standing erect not more than a foot from the muzzle of the gun. This load fired between his clashing teeth and into his frothing mouth did the work. When the smoke cleared away a 600 pound bear laid at the feet of the youthful, but brave hunter.—Recorder.

Two Clerks.

ED. POCAHONTAS TIMES:

Now that the election is drawing near and there seems to be more interest manifested in the Clerkship of the two Courts than in any other office to be filled at this election, I desire, without predjudice to any of the aspirants for the positions, to give expression to a sentiment which I find is held by a great many of the people of the County and which is steadily growing, viz: that the two offices should be divided. It is generally believed that the fees of either office will pay sufficiently well to secure a competent man for each position. If this be the case then why shall not the voters have the right to say who shall fill each office.

I believe this is the only county in the State where there is not a separate Clerk for each Court, and it is well known among the business men of the County that during a term of either Court, parties from a distance frequently wish to examine the records of the Court or have business transacted therein, so that it is absolutely necessary that the Clerk should be there himself or by deputy. If he is also the Clerk of the Court then in session he must have a deputy, who frequently is then only temporarally and is not sufficiently well acquainted with the office to render efficient service. It does seem that those who have the fees to pay should have the right to say who should occupy each office. This subject is brought more forcibly to my attention at this particular time because of the fact that we have such good material to select from. Four candidates each of whom are well qualified for the Clerkship of either Court—each of whom, I doubt not would be satisfied with the fees of either office.

Then, as we cannot elect all let us make two of them happy instead of one.

A VOTER,

WASHINGTON LETTER.

From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 20.—

It will be a general surprise and matter of interest to those who have watched the discussion in the Senate on the silver problem, to learn of the victory gained this week by the free coinage men. Although a great uncertainty on the subject prevailed, when it came to a vote in the Senate, the conservative men were beaten at every point, and by greater majorities than they had allowed themselves to expect.

Mr Wolcott, the junior Senator, of Colorado made the final effort of consequence in the contest. It was his maiden effort before the Senate, and the chamber, which has remained comparitively empty of late, was filled with an audience in anticipation of something worth listening to. He made a stirring speech, without the use of notes, and at the close was accorded an ovation, such as is seldom seen in the Senate. Ordinarily neither members or visitors in the galleries pretend to listen to a speech delivered in Congress. Although common decency is observed it is a great difficulty to hear an ordinary speaker. But the resonant voice of Mr. Wilcott penetrated every part of the Senate chamber. Senators come tip-toeing from their cloak rooms to hear him, and intently watched his line of argument. It was a compliment that is not frequently offered an entirely new man in Congress, and at the conclusion of his ovation he was surrounded by senators anxious to extend their felicitations. In the voting that followed, absolutely no party lines were observed. Both democrats and republicans were in favor of and against free coinage; which was passed by the Senate, and has, practically, become a law. Of course the concurrence of the House and President is still required; but it is understood that the majority of the House are in favor of it, and that they voted for the House silver bill with the expectation that it would be amended, to meet their actual views in the Senate. No difficulty is apprehended in obtaining the Presidents approval of the bill; which is briefly as follows:

After its passage, the value of a dollar is to be considered 412½ grains silver, and 25 8-10, grains gold. That any one possessing as much as $100 worth of the precious metals may have it coined into money atmint in the United States.

Silver is made legal tender; as are also the certificates to be issued by the Treasurer in the purchase of bullion. In fact the free coinage men got everything they wanted, including the restoration to circulation of the securities held by the U. S. Treasurer for the redemption of the circulation of the national banks. The republican papers here blame the Finance committee, and charge it with the guilt of grave error in tactics; and in having placed the President in a very embarassing position. He had taken a very positive stand on the question of free coinage, but now that the ultra silver men have developed such an unexpected strength, the President will either have to swallow the pill, or abandon any hopes he may have entertained for a second term in office.

The anti trust bill was passed Wednesday. At a conference representing both Houses, both receded from their previone demands in regard to amendments; and the bill as passed, is practically, in the same condition as first produced by the Senate.

The Finance committee of the Senate reported the Tariff bill, as they had amended it Wednesday afternoon; and printed copies were distributed, which were eagerly examined. A rough estimate makes it appear that the committee's amendments increase the public revenues, above that expected from the McKinley bill, about $15,000,000 per annum. In this calculation, it is estimated that $10,500,000 is added by increased duties on tobacco. Other commodities imported are also increased in the tariff schedule above those rates fixed in the McKinley bill, as the extravagance of the present administration has been so excessive, no other course was left the committee, which had been loudly prompted by the Treasury department that a big deficit was liable to occur with the public purse.

Binding twine which is used so largely by farmers now at harvest time, and which the Farmers Alliance have tried so hard, recently, to have taken off the tariff list, is largely increased, in duty above that called for in the McKinley bill. There is great complaint that the bill has been too hastily considered by the committee, and that where increases have been made the advance was too much; and that reductions in other schedules have been excessive.

Incongruities also exist. For instance flax pays $20 per ton; while its refuse tow pays $25. The bill will not be called up before July 1, but there is a prompt expression that the committee's report is unscientific and too hastily drawn.

In reference to the partiality shown Pension Atty. Geo. E. Lemon recently, by the Commissioner of Pensions, some wicked punster here declares that the commissioner claims that he had received no "Lemon aid.".

BRIDGE LETTING.

Sealed Bids will be received until 12 M., July 8th 1890, for the following Work, for the Bridge over Knapp's Creek, near Huntersville, W. Va.

Two abutments, one on each side of Creek. To be 21 feet by 7 feet at base and 18 feet by 3 feet at top, about 16 feet high built of regular cut stone on bed, sides and ends, with chowfered joints at a declension of 12 inches in 8 feet on front and rear wall and a declension of 9 inches in 8 feet on ends, ends to be circular. Joints all well broken, layers on corners, to be not less than 15 inches nor more than 24 inches high, and not less than 2 feet broad; all stone in outside wall to be not less than 2 feet long, except to complete a layer and then the shorter stones to be used in rear walls and joints well broken, the first layer of base to be carefully beded down on the slate foundation—all laid in cement up to 2 feet above high water mark, above this in lime and sand.

The Wing Walls to be laid well below the frost line, extend back 25 feet from abutment, and be laid up with large stone at a declension of 12 inches in 8 feet, well built with uncut stone, without morter, wall to be at least two feet thick, and of sufficient height. Either two or four wing walls will be built as the County Court may hereafter elect. Also for moving the bridge from its present location, and placing it on the abutments aforesaid, when they are completed, with the following additional work: The roof of said bridge to be painted, and the Cords of said bridge over the joints are to be braced by an additional pieces of timber securd by four bolts (1 inch) at each joint; and all parts of the bridge must be sound and not split or damaged in anyway, when rebuilt. The land on which said bridge is to be located has been condemned and the work will be proceeded with at once after the contract is let. The Court reserves the right to reject any and all bids, and will require bond from the contractor to whom the work is let for the faithful performance of his contract.

HOME NEWS

—Harvest prospects abroad are favorable.

—Are your mowers and reapers ready.

—Early mowing is favorable to a second crop of grass.

—Levy term of the County Court convenes on the second Monday in July.

—As a rule, early cut hay is of better quality than late cut, and quality is better than quantity.

—Do not be in a hurry to cut grass while the dew is on; it will dry faster while standing.

—Begin early in the season and make hay while the sun shines." This is the best general rule in hay making that can be laid down.

—Mrs. Ellen B. McCormick, of Cherrytree, Pa., died at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. E. H. Camp in Ronceverte, on the 12th inst.

—Lots of girls—sweet ones too—in Stream Valley.—Highland Recorder. [Bros. Seig and Mather, we think it very mean in you to tell on the girls that way.]

—The wheat harvest of the Valley of Virginia has been in active progress during the week. There are conflicting views in regard to the size of the crop, but all accounts agree that the quality of the wheat is good.

—A quarterly meeting was held in the M. E. church South, here last Saturday and Sunday. Presiding Elder S. G. Ferguson, preached a series of the most excellent sermons it has been our privilege to listen to in a good while.

—Capt. C. B. Swecker, of Dunmore, will be a candidate for the Legislature, to represent this and Webster counties. Comment is unnecessary as Capt. Swecker is well known in this County.

—Changing pastures make fat calves.

—A grand picnic just above Mr. H. M. Lockridges and one at Marlinton on the 4th of July.

—Capt. Geo. Siple, of Green Bank, was in to see us Tuesday.

—Drs. Rod and Mat. Edmiston, of Weston, were visiting Mr. J. J. Beard's family last week.

—Candidates were both numerous and very polite, during Court last week.

—The thermometer has been standing at from 90 to 95 degrees in the shade for several days.

—Attorney C. F. Moore and brother Harry, are attending the sale of lots at Clifton Forge, Va., this week.

—Very heavy rain and hail storm passed over Brown's creek, about three or four miles from Huntersville, Tuesday, doing considerable damage to growing crops &c.

—Don't forget the picnics. One at Marlinton and one about 4 miles above Huntersville in Mr. Wm. H. Cleek's sugar grove, the 4th of July.

—One hundred good white envelopes, post paid to any address on receipt of 25 cents, at THE TIMES office.

—Mrs. Jones hasn't a gray hair in her head and is over 50. She looks as young as her daughter. The secret of it is, that she uses only Hall's Hair Renewer.

—Huntersville Division, Sons, of Temperance, will meet at the usual place, next Saturday evening, June 28th.

—Bishop Geo. W. Peterkin, will preach on the 13th of July at Clover Lick, at 11 a. m.; at Huntersville, at 8 p. m. and at Academy, on the 14th at 8 p. m.

—SAVED.—A fine family of children were all afflicted with scrofula. Two died early; the rest would soon have followed, but for the timely and perserving use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which built them up into a healthy and vigorous manhood.

—Mr. L. B. Philips, of Buckhannon, this State, is selling the Stuart force pump in this County, and as far as we have heard, is pronounced by the people who are trying them to be the best pump in existence. He put one in our town well, and we believe it cannot be excelled in quality durability and excellence.

—You can never know till you try, how quickly a dose of Ayer's Pills will cure your sick headache. Your stomache and bowels need cleansing, and these pills will accomplish it more effectively and comfortably than any other medicine you can find.

—The annual Childrens' Day services of the Huntersville Southern Methodist Sunday school, will be conducted next Sunday at 9:30 a. m. A nice programme of songs recitations and class exercises will be issued. The church will be decorated and everything arranged to make the services interesting. A collection for the benefit of needy Sunday school will be lifted.

—There will be on the 4th of July a grand picnic in the sugar grove on Knapp's creek about four miles from Huntersville near Mr. H. M. Lockridge's. A large dancing platform will be erected for the occasion, also swings &c. Everybody are invited to attend. Refreshments will be sold on the ground. Also we understand it has been circulated that 25 cents would be charged each person coming on the grounds, which isn't at all true.

DENTISTRY.

Dr. J. H. Waymouth will be at Edray, July 2nd and remain 5 days; Mill Point, July 9th and remain 4 days; Huntersville July 14th, 4 days; Frost, July 18th, 4 days; Green Bank, July 23rd, 5 days, and will be prepared to attend to all Dental work. Call early and make your engagements as his time is limited to the above dates. 48-2t

—The Second Quarterly meeting of Pocahontas Circuit M. E. Church, will be held at Brush Run in a grove three miles south of Travelers Repose the first Saturday and Sunday in July. Dinner on the ground. Preaching at 2 p. m., after which there will be some persons baptised by immersion.

Attention Republicans.

At a meeting of the Republican Executive Committee of Pocahontas County held in Huntersville, on 16th day of June 1890, it was ordered, upon vote of said Committee, that the Republicans of Pocahontas County be requested to meet in convention at Huntersville, on Tuesday, July 8th, 1890, at 1 o'clock p. m. for the purpose of electing delegates to the Congressional Convention, to be held at Hinton, on 21st day of August next; to elect delegates to the Senatorial Convention; to elect a County Executive Committee, and to transact such other business as the convention may deem proper.

It is the desire of the Committee that there be a full attendance from all parts of the County at Huntersville, on July 8th.

S. B. MOORE, Chairman.
H. S. RUCKER, Secretary.

Dunmore Doings.

Arthor Beard, son of Josiah Beard, was killed by lightning at his home, near Green Bank, last Saturday, aged 12 years. While in the field sowing buckwheat the storm came up, and he was told by his brother who was with him to shelter under an oak tree, which he did, and in a few moments his brother heard the peal of thunder and looked to see his brother fall a lifeless corpse at the foot of the tree. Another example that impresses forcibly upon our mind that "In the midst of life we are in death." The bereaved family have the sympathy of all who know them.

Prayer meeting at X roads school house next Sunday at 2 p. m.

Misses Alice and Lena McGlaughlin and Capt. C. B. Swecker, while driving Sunday, let their team run away, throwing them out and smashing the carriage to a considerable extent. Fortunately no one was hurt. The team ran about two miles.

Harry Moore, Esq., is at Clifton Forge, Va., this week.

Miss Mattie Smith is at Ronceverte this week.

W. C. Mann, Esq., and wife, of Edray, are here on a visit.

The County Farmers Alliance is booming.

Some person or persons tore up the culverts between John Wanless' and McCutcheon's last Sunday. Suppose the next grand jury will look after the matter.

Wayside Notes.

Thursday the 8th of June, 1890, was spent by the writer in the vicinity of Split Rock. It was a day of surpassing loveliness and the scenery around the famous Big Spring and its contiguous vallies unrivalled for forest charms, never appeared to better advantage.

The occasion of this pleasant visit, was the marriage of Miss Emma N. McCalpin and Mr. John A. Sheets, to be celebrated at the home of James H. McCalpin, Esq. Promptly at 2 o'clock, p. m. the Bridal party appeared on the floor, in the presence of a large number of relatives and neighbors, when the vows were pronounced by Wm. T. Price of Marlinton.

The bride's maids were Misses Lena McCalpin and Katie Sheets; the groomsmen Messrs. Luther Sharp and Andrew Geiger.

The bride and her attendants were attired in spotless white and presented a very attractive appearance indeed.

A varied and bountiful repast was served up. More than fifty persons partook of the good cheer and all passed off in a very becoming manner. Dinner over, the remainder of the sunny afternoon was spent by the young people in a pleasant walk through the green meadows to the store, and picture gallery, while others formed part of the audience addressed by an agent of the Farmer's Alliance.

These young persons have a great many friends to wish their long continued happiness, in the relation so auspiciously entered upon.

One of the most ancient of the anglo saxon proverbs is to this purport, "Blessed is the bride the sun shines on." W. T. P.

County Alliance.

A number of delegates from the several Sub-Alliances of the County convened at the Court house last Saturday and organized a County Farmers Union with the following officers:

M. J. McNeel, President; I. B. Moore, Vice President; C. R. Moore, Secretary; J. A. Taylor, Chaplain; A. M. McGlaughlin, Treas.; Geo. R. Curry, Lect.; Geo. W. Siple, Asst. Lect.; H. Lee White, Door keeper; C. B. Swecker, Sgt-at Arms; Edwin S. Beard, Business Manager.

Delegates to organization of State Union:

J. S. McNeel, H. M. Moore and L. S. Cochran.

Alternates:

Levi Gay, L. W. Herold and C. R. Moore.

On motion, the Sec. was directed to furnish notice of organization to the ED. of POCAHONTAS TIMES, with the request that he publish the same.

Adjourned to meet at the C. H. Friday Oct. 3rd, 1 o'clock p. m.

If there is one thing greater than a girl's praise of her home when she is in another town it is her abuse of it in comparing it to the other town when she gets back.

Young Mr. Scheinstein: "Do you dink dot marriage vas a vailure, Uncle Moses?" Uncle Moses: "Off you make shnish by marrying it vas as good as a vailure, my poy."

Emily—Did Geoege propose last night as you thought he would?

Rose (without much enthusiasm)—Yes, he proposed.

Emily—Did you accept him?

Rose—Of course.

Emily—But you don't seem to be very happy over it.

Rose—I am not. There is a gathering doubt about George in my mind.

Emily—You surprise me. On what account Rose?

Rose—He didn't appear to be sufficiently nervous over it. (Throwing herself into her friend's arms and bursting into tears.)

Oh, Emily, I'm afraid George has proposed to some other girl before!

Mr. Gotham—And so my son, you have been very successful in the west.

Enterprising Son—Yes, indeed, father. I've become a city founder.

"A What?"

"I found cities you know. Fine paying business, I can tell you, Look at this map of Golden Rod City. Look at the parks, and boulevards, and corners for public buildings, and the big spaces for factories. I sold 1,000 lots in Golden Rod City last month. Just think of that!"

"My! my! Where is it located?"

"Well, the fact is, it ain't located anywhere yet; but that'll be fixed after we sell a few hundred lots more. You see, there isn't any use looking for a location until we have money enough to pay for the land you know."

Why Woman is Man's Best Friend.

First and foremost woman is man's best friend:

Because she is his mother.

Second because she is his wife.

Because she is patient with him in illness, endures his fretfulness and "mothers" him.

Because she will stick to him through good and evil reports, and always believe in him if she loves him.

Because without her he would be rude, rough and ungodly.

Because she teaches him the value of gentle words, of kindly thought and of consideration.

Because with him she can endure pain quietly and meet joy gladly.

Because on her breast, he can shed tears of repentance, and he is never reminded of them afterwards.

Because when he is behaving like a fretful boy—and we all do, you know, at times—with no reason in the world for it, woman's soft word, touch or glance will make him ashamed of him self as he ought to be.

Because without her as an incentive he would grow lazy there would be no good work done, there would be no noble books written, there would be no beautiful pictures painted, there would be no divine strains oof melody.

Because she has made for us a beautiful world in which we should be proud to live and contented to die.

Concerning the Lover

When he comes to see you, let me give you a few hints as to your treatment of him.

First of all, my dear, don't let him get an idea that your one object in life is to get all you can out of him.

Don't let him believe that you think so lightly of yourself that whenever he has an idle moment he can find you ready and willing to listen to him.

Don't let dim think you are going out driving with him alone, even if your mother should be lenient enough to premit this.

Don't let him think that you are going to the dance or frolick with him; you are going with your brother, or else you are going to make up a party which will all go together.

Don't let him call you by your first name, at least not until you are engaged to him, and then only when you are by yourselves.

Don't let him put his arms around you and kiss you; when he put the pretty ring on your finger it meant that you were to be his wife soon, he gained a few rights, but not the one of indiscriminate caressing. When he placed it there he was right to put a kiss on your lips; it was the seal of your love; but if you give your kisses too freely they will prove of little value. A maiden fair is like a beautiful, rich, purple plum, it hangs high up on the tree and is looked at with envy. He who would get it must work for it, and all the trying should be on his side, so that when he gets it appreciates it. You know the story of the man who saw a beautiful plum on a tree, which he very much wanted. Next to it hung another plum; it seemed as beautiful, and apparently just as sweet as the one he wanted. The seeker for it stood under it for a moment, looked at it with longing eyes, and, behold, the plum dropped into his mouth. Of what value was it then? It was looked at and cast aside. Now take this little story, and make it point the moral that I wish it to.

FRANK SLOCUM'S IDOL.

There was not a more triving seaport city in the south in 1860 than Apalachicola Fla. Railroads were not near so plentiful as they are now, and a large amount of the cotton grown in Georgia and Alabama was carried down the Chattahoochee by the eighteen magnificent steamers then plying its murky waters.

It was my custom to visit this pretty little city every winter and shoot ducks at lake Shipley. It was on my annual trip in the year above named that I met and became fondly attached to Frank Slocum. Like myself he was fond of sport and we spent many pleasant days together on the bay or among the numerous little streams that enter it.

Frank was purser on one of the river steamers and one of the handsomest young men I ever knew and equally as noble as he was handsome. During our intimacy he had confided in me and I learned that his whole soul was wrapped up in Grace Brown, the lovely daughter of a rich cotton merchant.

From what I could learn the match would prove a most acceptable one. Frank had energy and brains, while the girl was beautiful and wealthy—a good combination I thought.

I had never met Miss Brown but once and must confess that in her steel blue eyes appeared something that made me feel a little uncomfortable in her presence. She did not appear cruel or heartless, but there was to my mind a selfish expression about them that was entirely different from Frank's honest, brown eyes.

The time for the marriage was set for the following May, and as each day passed by Frank became more and more impatient for the winter season to close.

One beautiful Sabbath evening that new and fast mail steamer, the John C. Calhoun, turned her head up stream with the United States mail. Thousands of handkerchiefs waved from the wharves as she steamed swiftly by on her maiden trip up the river. She was in command of the gallant Captain Crawford, and Frank Slocum stood at the desk in the purser's office. The Calhoun was by odds the swiftest and handsomest craft that ever pliedthe Chattahoochee, and was the pride of the city. Little did the thousands who waved her an adieu on this occasion think that it would be a final one.

The Monday following was a dark day for Apalachicola. The steamer, Ware had arrived from up the river and brought the startling and horrible intelligence that the Calhoun had been blown up by an explosion of its boilers and that the gllant Captain Crawford and thirteen other persons had been killed.

The report proved only too true, and as additional particulars arrived the terrors of the explosion were intensified. A landing had just been made, the mail delivered and the boat was rounding out into the river when the explosion occurred.

Later in the day another steamer reached the city bringing the dead and the wounded, Frank Slocum being among the latter. I hurried to his bed side and found the poor fellow horribly scalded about his handsome face and suffering untold agony. He was tenderly cared for, and day after day, as I sat by his bedside watching for returning consciousness, there never was but one name upon his lips and that was Grace. She frequently sent to inquire about him but never ventured to call until one evening when Frank was able to sit up, I wrote her a note and begged her to look in upon him if only for a moment, as it would do the poor fellow so much good. She came accompanied, by a servant, but as soon as she got one glance at my poor friend's scarred face, turned deadly white and without uttering a word left the room, while Frank, with outstretched hands, sobbed as if his heart would break.

In a few days I left for Georgia, bringing Frank with me. It was several months before he fully recovered, but the dark and cruel marks on his face told a tale of horror that was heart rending.

He never alluded to Grace Brown again, but once in speaking to me of his experience during the explosion said:

"When I was thrown violently through the hurricane deck my prayer was that I might not fall on the burning boat and might be spared to live. Had I known what I have since learned, this is the very thing I would have prayed for."

* * *

The ports had been closed and troops were hurrying in every direction to the front. Frank and I were among the first to volunteer and with the—th Georgia took part in the first battle of Manassas. The rash bravery here displayed by my young friend won the plaudits of his comrades and officers, but as they bore him from the field mortally wounded I knew it to be a willing sacrifice, for Frank did not think life worth living.

* * *

Time had wrought its changes and in ten years afterward, as I strolled along the desolate wharves of Apalachicola I felt sick at heart to compare the city of 1860 with that of 1870. The commerce of the town had been destroyed, and none of its former thrift and prosperity seemed visible. As I leaned lasily against a weather-beaten anchor an old sailor approached; I beckoned to him and tendering him a cigar, engaged him in conversation. He told me much as to the hardships of the people whom I had once known. Finally I asked him about the Browns.

"Come with me," he said.

We walked to the lower end of the wharves where is located a miserable lot of little shanties extending over the water. The old sailor stopped in front of one of these and pointed to the door.

In this miserable abode sat a decrepit, dirty, haggard woman, fearfully scarred with small-pox, surrounded by four or five ragged children, all of them engaged in stringing fish.

That woman was Grace Brown!

R. B. HARRISON.

He—Talking about names, I wish I could get mine changed. I think it is too ugly for anything.

She (enthusiastically)—Oh, I don't, I think it is lovely!

Lawyer—My conscience troubled me last night, about that fee I charged Jones yesterday.

Friend (astonished)—Your conscience!

Lawyer—Certainly, I was afraid that I had been unjust to myself.

Patrick—"It's mighty quare how things do rin in a fam'ly sometimes, Mike." Michael—"Yis, it's so Pat. Now, there's Mrs. Chumakilly—she has no childer—an' if I remember right, it was just the same with her mother before her."

THE TRAMP KITTEN.

BY HELEN F. CLARA.

"I hate cats," said Ted.

"So do I," echoed Frank Tibbals.

"There goes one now!" screamed Joe Walters, and catching up a stone from the edge of the pavement he flung it at the timid little creature crouching behind a doorstep acros the street.

"I say, Joe, that cat's not harting you. Why can't you let it alone?" said Fred Raymond.

"When did you turn baby?" sneered Joe tantalizingly. "I'm going to have another shy at it," and reached for a second stone.

Fred stood irresolute, while the stone sped swiftly across the street. The aim was all too true, for the sharp pebble struck the poor cat's leg, and, with a pitiful cry of pain, she sprang into the air and then fell helplessly back on the pavement.

"You brute!" exclaimed Fred in his anger, and no longer a coward, he dashed across and lifted the mewing cat into his arms.

"What are you going to do with her, Fred?" asked Frank.

"Take her home. I guess mother won't care."

Joe laughed and sneered again, calling him a "baby" and "girl boy," but Fred walked bravely on to his own home and rang the bell at the basement door.

"O Fred, we don't want any cats. There's plenty of them out in the back yard," said cook quickly.

"Never mind, Mary, this cat's hurt. I think mother will let her lie in the kitchen till she gets well, and then she can go away again."

Mrs. Raymond came down to see the cat. She wasn't a very attractive specimen of the cat family, for she was long and lank, and so thin that cook declared you could "count the bones." Then, too, she was far from clean, and so timid that she she would run at least noise, and try to escape from even a kindly hand. Mrs. Raymond bathed the swelling joint with arnica, and then carefully bandaged it, while Fred made her a bed in an old basket, and put her in a warm corner by the range, and went back to his play with a light heart.

The boys still teased him about the cat, but he bore it patiently and stuck to his purpose of being kind to animals.

The secret of it all was that Fred's Sunday school teacher had talked very earnestly to his class on the previous Sunday about being kind to God's defenceless creatures, and had told them about the little sparrows that never fell to the ground without the knowledge of the great heavenly Father. And then he told them also of the time that was coming some day when the animals should no longer bite and devour one another, but the wolf and the lamb should feed together, and the lion eat straw like the bullock, and they turned in their Bibles to the eleventh and the sixty fifth chapters of Isaiah and read the wonderful words for themselves.

And Fred did not forget the lesson, and when the time came for him to put it into use, he did so bravely and honorably.

Poor kitty was very sick, and mewed a good deal, till cook's patience well nigh gave way. Then, too, she was afraid of even the kind hands that ministered to her, so that it was very hard to take care of the wounded leg. But one day little four-year-old Daisy came down to the kitchen to play a while, and spying poor kitty lying on her bed in the basket, she sat down beside her and began patting and stroking her head and back with a loving hand, till the poor abused, friendless creature began to purr as happily as though she had never been a poor little tramp in her life. From that hour she made fast friends with Daisy, and when her leg got well, she followed the little girl about all day long, and was so gentle and frolisome that Mrs. Raymond declared her splendid play fellow for the child.

But there came a day when Fred... thanked his Heavenly Fa... from the bottom of his heart ... he had learned to be kind to his... tle creature. For one day—how ... happened nobody knew—Daisy sl... ped away from busy mamma down to the kitchen, and when cook was "head over ears in work," as she said, the little girl followed the grocer's boy out of the half-closed gate, and climbing the low basement steps toddled up the street as happy and care free as a lark. P... scampered after her and caught hold of her soft white dress, ... to draw her back, but Daisy ... said:

"Poor pussy mustn't te... dress. Mamma make p... for baby, pussy mus'n't ... and her little feet patte... the street. Block after ... went, past the beautiful ... over into the park, under ... of the green trees, Daisy ... on the grass and played ... time, till at last she sank to ... on the soft grass, while pussy ... anxious watch beside her.

Mrs. Raymond supposed her little girl was with Mary in the kitchen, and Mary never had a thought but that the child was in the nursery or with her mother, and so two full hours passed before they discovered their loss. Then, with pallid face, Mrs. Raymond hastened to the police station to sound the alarm of a lost child, while Fred, with burning heart and burning eyes, scoured the streets in every direction for runaway baby; but no trace of her could either of them find, and they waited and watched, and then went out to search again and again, only to return to their homes in greater fear and suspense.

The sun was just beginning to sink in the west when Fred, who was standing on the balcony out of the window, exclaimed with a ringing voice, "Mamma, mamma, here she is! Here is baby; the cat is bringing her home!"

There she was, toddling wearily up the street, aimlessly following pussy as she pranced and frolicked before her, or gently tugging at her dress, when the child loitered or turned out of the way.

Mrs. Raymond dashed down the stairs and into the street, and caught the tired baby to her breast, while Fred lifted the faithful cat in his arms and actually hugged her with joy.

When the daughters are infants, mothers are anxious to keep matches out of their reach. Quite the reverse takes place when they grow up, for then the puzzle is to find the matches.

VICTORY FOR THE LOTTERY COMPANY.—The Louisiana House after debating the proposition at length, pass the Lottery bill, submitting to the popular vote a constitutional amendment extending the charter of the Louisiana State Lottery Company for twenty five years in return for $1,000,000 a year. The vote stood 66 to 29, just enough to pass the bill, as it requires a two thirds vote, and the House consists of ninety eight members. The bill is reasonably sure to pass the Senate with the same two-thirds majority. It can not be vetoed by the Governor, but goes before the people in April, 1892, and will have to receive a majority of all the votes then to become a law.

A NATION OF COFFEE DRINKERS.—The United States is without a doubt a nation of coffee drinkers. The imports from South America amount to over 325,000,000 pounds annually, of which 69 per cent. comes from Brazil. The second largest shipper to this market is Venezuela, 11 per cent. The first cost in this country averages ten cents and a fraction a pound, aggregating $35,347,000. The first record of production in Brazil begins with 1876, when 180,000,000 pounds were shipped to the United States. High water mark was reached in 1885, with 400,000,000 pounds of shipments. One large item of expense in Brazil is to get the coffee to market. Freight charges as high as fourteen cents a ton a mile have been paid, which from a distant plantation to Rio Janeiro means from $1.25 to $2.50 a sack. The highest charge from Rio to New York is sixty five cents a bag.—N. Y. Herald.

Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflamation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

From our regular correspondent.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 27.—

After the long dispute between the House and Senate, regarding the final disposition of the pension problem an end has been reached.

Innumerable bills on the subject have been introduced in both houses.

The original measure Senate, was a dependent pension bill, of the same character as that vetoed by President Cleveland.

The House insisted upon the introduction of a service pension; by granting a pension of $8 per month to every soldier of 62 years of age and hereafter when he got that old.

This Senate was hostile to this idea and forced the House to drop it; but in turn, it has been compelled to make a greater concession.

A conference committee of both Houses have made an agreement [on a] bill which was already been ratified by the Senate, and will unquestionably be the law on that subject, which, briefly stated is as follows: All soldiers who have served as long as three months, honorably discharged, and "and who are now, or may hereafter, be suffering from any mental or physical disability, of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor, so as to render them unable to earn a support" are to receive pensions of from $6 to $12 per month, the amount depending upon the soldiers inability to earn a support.

One section of the bill relates to the pension of protecting pensions, and an attempt is made to facilitate it, in respect to dependent parents.

Hereafter the evidence they will be obliged to furnish will be the soldiers death, and their own dependence upon manual labor for support; and the fact that the soldiers by reason of existing laws could not have secured a pension for himself, does not interfere any longer with the parents.

Soldiers' widows, regardless of the cause or time of the soldiers death who depend upon "daily labor for support," are to receive $8 per month. If he has left minor children, they are to receive $2 per month, until they reach the age of 16, and indefinitely afterwards, if they be mentally or physically disabled.

Of course it will cost the government a great amount to fulfill the requirements of the bill. The amounts estimated are as various as there are people interested in the subject; but the bill will probably place on the pension rolls 90 per cent. of the old soldiers who have heretofore, been neglected.

THE SEMI-CENTENNIAL

Beyond question the most interesting fact in the history of Independence day is that the man who drafted the Declaration and the man who stood at his side when he introduced it into congress, and who predicted with accuracy its future fame, died upon the same day and exactly fifty years after completing the greatest act of their lives.

They differed in almost every element of character, yet both were ardent patriots, upright law makers, and, in their ways, able statesmen. The Massachusetts man, with a Puritanical education and inherent distrust of universal suffrage, and the Virginian, or extremely liberal training and unbounded faith in democracy, worked their way to exactly the same conclusion in regard to Great Britain and the colonies. They stood together like brothers while the war lasted, then became the heads of radically differing parties, and were not reconciled till age had cooled their ambition, retirement had allowed resentment to die.

They probably agreed more nearly as to religious questions than any other. John Adams called himself a Unitarian, and posterity has agreed to call Thomas Jefferson a Deist, yet it is impossible to define with any exactness how they differed as to the attributes of God or the moral government of the universe. Adams certainly said the harsher things of Calvinism, but that was probably because he lived where Calvinism was still the ruling power; and it is amusing to note that Jefferson, who never spoke of any man's religion when could decently avoid it was long and vehemently denounced as a blasphemer and "French infidel," while Adams was popularly regarded as orthodox.

The popular instinct, however, was sound; the mind of Adams was reverential—to a degree far greater than that of Jefferson. Some old writer has summed up their alliance in the Revolution, for different reasons, by saying that Adams want[ed] all the existing liberties of English [illegible] by establishing a great and better England in America, while Jefferson wanted a new system root and branch, to secure the absolute liberties of human nature.

John Adams was born Oct. 19, 1735, and Thomas Jefferson April 2, 1744; the former also lived a few hours later, his age at death being within three months of 91, while that of Jefferson was but 83. Jefferson was an extreme blonde, Adams somewhat darker; the former was tall and in youth somewhat ungainly, while the latter was rather below the medium size, fir[m]ly knit and graceful from his youth. Their friendship seemed to increase till the peace and they corresponded freely; but in their service abroad each had an experience which even then indicated that they were soon to be political opponents, the narration of which is both amusing and instructive.

John Adams, as the first American minister to England, was, to put it bluntly snubbed; Thomas Jefferson, on the contrary, was received with enthusiastic welcome at the court of France. The former denounced George III and his ministers, but bestowed high praise on the British government and people; the latter passed King Louis XVI over with something very like a sneer, and railed at his queen. When Minister Adams, after long delay, met George III for the first time the king said abruptly:

"Mr. Adams, I wish you to understand that I was the last man to consent to the independence of America."

Adams made an equally brusque reply: "I have no feeling or affection save for my own country."

"An honest man will have no other," rejoined the king, and so they became good friends.

Whe[n] Minister Jefferson was introduced to Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette, his queen they over whelmed him with compliments and good wishes for "our dear allies, the Americans," to which he replied with only official courtesy, was soon intensely interested in the signs of the coming French revolution. It was plain, even then, that Thomas Jefferson would defend that revolution.

That Adams wanted a stronger central government for the United States and Jefferson a larger measure of local independence is a fact known to all. Two parties formed, and then came the French revolution and roused political passions to the boiling point. If the two had been superior to human nature and intent on remaining friends, their furious partisans would not have allowed it. They exchanged only the coldest official courtesies, and for thirteen years did not correspond. The indignation of Mrs. Abigail Adams over a wrong done to her son, John Quincy, was indirectly the cause of reconciliation. She asked for an explanation; Jefferson wrote and convinced her that he was in no wise responsible, and soon the old confidence was restored.

Thus harmonized, the two old statesmen and patriots descended hand in hand, as it were, to the grave. On the evening of July 3, 1826, it became evident that Jefferson was dying. A little after midnight he revived and remarked, "This is the Fourth of July." Early in the forenoon he became unconscious and soon expired—within one hour of exactly fifty years after presenting the Declaration to congress. About 3 o'clock the same day Mr. Adams was roused by hearing the shouts of the people in a distant grove, celebrating the day. He mentioned the fact and added, "Thomas Jefferson still lives." Soon after he breathed his last.

As the slow mails of those days spread the news the people were overcome by the great coincidence and remarked that heaven itself had set the seal of its high approval upon their great work by calling home on its first semi-centennial the author and the chief supporter of the Declaration of Independence.

—Capt. C. B. Swecker, of Dunmore, will accept our many thanks for a box of nice cigars.

—Mr. J. R. Poage, Sr., of Edray, is visiting his daughter Mrs. Amos Barlow in town, this week.

—French Hull, Esq., of the firm of W. H. Hull and son, of Edray called to see us Monday.

—We are authorized to announce a shooting match on Brown's creek, near Amos Curry's, Saturday July 12th.

—The childrens' day exercises in the Methodist church last Sunday, were largely attended and very interesting.

—Attorney C. F. Moore and brother Harry, returned from the drawing of lots at Clifton Forge Saturday. They have about twelve lots there.

—The following are the counties in this State that have only one Clerk for the Circuit and County Courts: Calhoun, Clay, Grant Hardy, Mineral, Monroe, McDowell, Pendleton, Pleasants, Wyoming and Pocahontas.

DENTISTRY.

[illegible]

—A faded and discolored beard is untidy and a misfortune. It may be prevented by using Buckingham's Dye for the Whiskers, a never failing remedy.

—We are requested to announce that there will be a grand public picnic at Marlinton, on the picnic grounds near the mouth of Stony creek, the 4th of July. Everybody are cordially invited to attend.

—S. B. Lowry, Esq., Jr., of Moomaw, Va., is visiting his father, in town this week. He informed us that he had left a big baby, three weeks old at home, making a total number of about six children he has, and one hearing him talk about it would think it was his first.

—Huntersville is coming to the front, along with the rest of the booming towns, without a word. The lumber for three new buildings is being hauled; one dwelling house for Attorney L. M. McClintic, an addition to Huntersville Hotel and a new printing office for the POCAHONTAS TIMES.

—No matter what may be the ills you bear from indgestion, a dose of Ayer's Cathartic Pills will ease you without question. Just try them once and be assured; they have much worse dyspeptic cured. You'll find them nice and amply worth the price.

—Mess. Jno. Hamilton, and Jno. Barnett, have returned from school at Concord. Our young friend Mr. Hamilton, graduated at the head of his class, and brought away with him two of the three gold medals given.

—Until the blood is cleansed of impurities, it is useless to attempt the cure of any disease. Rheumatism, which is traceable to an acid in the blood, has been cured, in numerous cases, by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, external treatment being of no avail.

—We hope when the County Court meets next Tuesday, they will make an allowance to, replace the rackety and disgraceful fence around the court house square with a new one. Also a new carpet for the court house would greatly add to its appearance, and the comfort of those who have business there.

—It has been reported that the picnic in the Grove at Mr. Wm. Cleek's would be characterized by drunkenness and rowdyism. We can assure the public upon the word of Mr. D. B. McElwee and Mr. Wm. Cleek, that no drinking or drunkenness will be allowed upon the grounds, and that nothing but perfect gentlemanly conduct will be tolerated at this picnic. The public is cordially invited and may rest assured there will be perfect order.

While some boys were playing in the woods near Perth, New York, last Thursday they found a large quantity of jewelry. The articles, which were partly buried, consisted of watches, chains, finger rings, etc., and filled a halfbushel measure. They were taken to Amsterdam. It is believed that the jewelry is part of that stolen from Norton's jewelry store in Gloversville recently.

Three colored men and one white man were hanged at Memphis. The white man objected to being executed with his colored brethren and was hanged half an hour after the three negroes had been killed.

THE LIFTED LOAD.

Jack Brantley was a brave man no one ever doubted that; and he was as brave. "A good man," they called him, and that was the general verdict of the people among whom he lived. He was what you would call a patient fellow, whenever patience was needed; thoughtful of others, generation in all things, and slow to anger. But he was a lion when aroused.

Jack had once led a wild life in Texas; that is, he had been in the cattle business there, and had known many thrilling adventures with the boys, and once, when he caught a man in the act of stealing one of his ponies, and the fellow drew a pistol on him, Jack shot him dead on the spot.

Of course he was justified in the act. There was no verdict from a coroner's jury—no trial in a court room; but the people thanked him for ridding the country of a desperado who had been a terror to them, and all memory of the affair soon passed from their minds.

But not from Jack's. Somehow, although he knew that he was justified—that it was either his life or the robber's—he could never quite forget that there was one grave more in the world because of him, and the eyes of the dead man seemed to follow him reproachfully. It was foolish in him to look at it in that way, but natural—and he couldn't help it.

Finally, he decided to leave Texas, and with a snug fortune he settled down in Tennessee, where he married. And his life seemed all the brighter for the smiles of a loving wife. And no man ever lavished more devotion on his wife than Jack Brantley.

But there is a cloud to every heaven; and the brighter the sun shines the darker the cloud when it comes.

It came one evening in a way Jack least expected, and threw its evil shadow over all the brightness of his life.

"Jack," said his loving wife, twining her arms about his neck, as they sat together in the quiet of their home. "Jack, I want to tell you something that I should have told you before. It's a little heart secret of mine, but I want you to know it."

Jack took her in his arms and kissed her, and then she said, with tears in he tender eyes:

"Jack I had a brother once who was a bad, bad man—at least they said he was; he led a wild life in Texas, and it was not long before the tidings came that he was dead—shot dead by a man whose horse he had taken—had taken without leave, and—Oh, Jack! What is the matter? Do you blame me for not telling you before?"

No! he didn't blame her; he was blaming himself, poor fellow! He had let his arms fall from the sweet circle of his wife's neck; his head was bowed, his face pale; a vision rose before him: In the midnight of that Texas border he heard the crack of a revolver; he saw a man reel from a horse, and heard his heavy fall to the ground, where he lay dead, with pale face and wildly staring eyes. But more than this—he saw himself, the slayer of his wife's brother!

The tears rolled down his cheeks; his hand trembled as he drew his weeping wife towards him. "Don't worry about it dear," he said, "I don't blame you at all; I only felt sorry—sorry for him—your brother."

God pity him! but he could not summon courage to tell her that he—her husband—had shed her brother's blood. He would wait awhile and think it over; he could not tell her now!

Time passed, but it was a heavy time to Jack. He lost all interest in business; there was a heavy load upon his heart which he sought in vain to hide from his wife, and the sadness of his life, ill-concealed, was making her life miserable. He had not forgiven her, she thought; he was sorry that he had married her—the sister of a thief!

Things could not continue thus, and Jack knew it. He saw that his wife misunderstood, him, and sooner or later he would have to confess all. But how should he bring it about? And how would she bear it? Would she not shrink from him—cease to love him, and, perhaps, leave him forever?

These were the thoughts that tortured him day by day, and night after night. And he went on wondering and hoping and fearing—the most miserable of men.

But one night he resolved to risk all and throw himself upon the mercy of his wife. As things were, they were both miserable; how could they live with such a burden on their hearts?

"Molly," he said, "I know you love me, and God knows I love you with all my heart. I would give my life for you, Molly. Would you give yours for me?"

"Yes, Jack."

That was all she could say for sobbing.

"Molly, don't you know that I would not do a wrong deed?"

"Yes."

"Molly—dear Molly—" and he folded her to his breast, and bowed his head on her shoulder, "I killed your brother!"

She drew away from him for a moment, standing at arm's length and holding his hands in hers. She looked straight in his eyes, with hot tears trickling from her own. Then she crept close to him again and sobbed on his breast.

It was a moment of suspense to Jack, but her answer was the woman's love and faith—she knew him she believed in him.

"I said I believed you would not do a wrong deed, Jack, and this is my faith in you now. I am your wife and I love you and believe in you."

"God bless you for that!" he cried. "Oh, Molly! what a load you have lifted from my heart!"

But he had lifted a load from his wife's heart, too.

MABEL'S HUSBAND.

"Of course, I shall never dare to speak another word to her!" said Robert Dale.

"But why not? Only tell me why not!" cried out little Florrie, climbing up the beams of the barn loft, so that her head should be just on a level with that of her tall brother, and clasping him around the neck with both arms.

Robert was a tall, handsome young athlete, at that moment busy in mending one of the cogs of a steam plow with deft and ready touch.

His dark brown hair hung in heavy masses over his broad forehead; his hazel eyes were full of latent fire, and there was a world of character and resolve in his mouth and chin. One might easily excuse Florrie Dale for being proud of such a brother.

"Don't you see, 'Florrie?'" said the young giant, gently putting away the hands that interfered with the delicate screw he held. "I never asked her to be my wife while she was the poor and dependent school-teacher here. How can I have the face to do it now that she has inherited a fortune?"

Florrie balanced herself on the beam, her dimpled face looking out from its frame work of hay; a speckled hen came cackling from half its nest in the fragrant hay, and a dozen captive swallows flew back and forth in the peak of the barn overhead.

"But you were just going to ask her, Bob, you know you were?"

"Ah, but how is she to know it?"

"Why, by instinct, of course," decided Florrie.

Dale shook his head, with rather a sad smile.

"No, my little girl," said he, "I do not choose to be mistaken for one the great army of fortune hunters. I've lost my opportunity, and there's an end of it. It's my own fault."

Florrie burst into tears.

"Oh, Bob!" said she.

Robert Dale stroked down her sunshiny head, not without a sparkle of moisture in his own eyes, but he smiled a wan smile, nevertheless.

"I've often read that pride was a sin," sobbed Florrie, "but I never comprehended it before. Oh, Bob, I could almost hate you, if I didn't love you, so dearly!"

And Florrie scrambled down from her perch on the beam, and ran away, with both hands clasped over her face.

Dale looked after her.

"Poor little darling!" he said to himself. "It is but a scratch on the surface of her tender young heart! On mine it is a deep wound, seared in with red-hot iron. God help me!"

It was one of those romances which occur in real life oftener than one has any idea of. Mabel Wynne was a pretty young school teacher in Abbott's District, whose life of poverty had suddenly been turned into riches by the bequest of a distant and nearly forgotten relative. To Mabel herself it seemed like a golden dream. How often she had built castles in the air, whereof the foundation was "If I were rich!" And now the dream had come true; the pinnacles of the air castles were actually shining athwart the sky of her life, heretofore such a cold and gray expanse!

"And now," said Mabel to herself, "I can fulfill all my heart's desires!"

She took counsel with no one, unless now and then an hour with the grayhaired old lawyer might come under that head; she simply did as she pleased.

"Ma's ye seen the new house that Mabel Wynne is buildin?" said one neighbor to another. "It's a reg'lar Aladdin's castle! With trees all cut away from the lake, and new drives made through the woods, and heathen statters set up here and there, and a row o' glass houses to raise furrin plants and ripen grapes and peaches before their time."

"I don't approve of no such notions," solemnly answered the other. "To my mind, it's a clear settin' o' Providence at defiance. Grapes in march! And orange trees a flowerin' in this 'ere climate, with the snow on the ground! Mark my words, there won't no good come of it!"

* * * * *

It was a bright September evening when Mabel Wynne stopped at at the old Dale farm-house.

Florrie rushed to meet her, and greeted her with hugs and kisses innumerable.

"Dear, dear May!" she said. "Why haven't you been to see us before?"

"Why haven't you been to see me?" retorted Mabel, with the piquant, offhand manner which was one of her greatest charms. "That is the question, I should think."

Florrie's eyelashes drooped; instinctively she turned to her brother.

Robert advanced to her rescue, offering Miss Wynne his hand, with an excellent imitation of composure.

"Because, Mabel, your time has been so much occupied," said he. "I told Florrie that things were changed—that you could hardly be expected to have leisure to devote to her silly prattle."

"How did you know that things were changed?" cried Mabel, with a resentful flash in her violet-blue eyes.

"My own common sense told me so."

"Was that the reason that you haven't been to see me?"

"One of the reasons."

"Oh!" said Mabel, with an indescribable intonation of voice, and fixing her eyes upon his with a sudden, questioning glance, which he was but too thankful to evade by looking another way. "That was all that you cared for your old friend, eh?"

"If I could be of any real practical use to my old friend—"

"You can," briefly interrupted Miss Wynne.

"Tell me how, and I shall be at your service."

Florrie put her arms around her friends neck, whispering softly:

"This is like old times, May!"

"And I shall want Florrie, too," added Mabel, "to help make out my own inexperience. A man's judgment and a woman's taste! May I count on both of you?"

"On me, certainly," said Robert Dale.

"You might know that I would be ready to help you!" cried Florrie, almost inclined to be aggrieved.

"Then, will you both come up to 'The Glen' tomorrow at 10 o'clock?"

"That's the name of your new fairy palace?"

"Didn't you know it?"

Robert smiled.

"I don't ask many questions," said he.

"Yes. It is called 'The Glen,'" she answered.

Mabel Wynne stayed, and spent the evening at the Dale farm-house. She and Florrie sang sweet part songs to the accompaniment of Robert's violin; they talked of old times and new; and when at last Robert returned from seeing Mabel home, Florrie clapped her hands gleefully.

"Oh, Bob," she cried, "isn't it nice to have Mabel here once more?"

And Bob's smile did her heart good.

The next day, however, things assumed a new aspect. Robert and Florrie walked up through the woods to the beautiful new house, whose stained-glass casements commanded so rare a view of hillside woodland, and distant, winding river. Mabel was standing on the portico.

"Now come in," she cried, radiantly. "Walk through all the rooms with me. Here is the library—I want Robert's idea about fitting that up—and here are the drawing rooms. Florrie and I must decide about those; for, to tell you the truth"—and she collored pinker than the heart of a rose—"I am going to be married!"

Florrie started back, with a little exclamation; Robert stood calm and quiet as one of the marble statues in the vestibule.

"Married!" Florrie cried—"and not to confide in me! Oh, May!"

"Tell me," said Mabel—"shall we furnish the drawing-rooms in blue and silver, or pink and gold? And shall my rooms be the south ones, or the suit looking out over the river? And Bob must have the vestibules furnished to suit a man's taste. I shouldn't like to have my husband criticise them when he comes. Will you do this for me, Bob, because of our old friendship? Oh, don't look so solemnly at me! I know I am asking a great deal, but I thought I could depend on you."

"You can," he answered, quietly.

"Come out and look at the new sun-dial on the south lawn, added Mabel. Florrie has run up stairs to see the river from the observatory. We won't wait for her; because, Bob, I want to tell you a secret."

"Would not your husband be the proper person to confide in, May?" he asked.

"In this case, no, Bob!" she cried. "Listen to me. I love this man with all my soul—this husband that is to be—and he loves me."

"Naturally," observed Robert, setting his teeth.

"But he does not dare to tell me so. He thinks, don't you see, that I am an heiress. Well, so I am; but I am a woman, nevertheless, and I love him! Is my wretched money to part us? If so, I will fling it all into the ocean, and begin life anew as a beggar-girl. Now, Bob, what shall I do? It is for this that I have sent for you to come here. Answer me, quickly!"

"Tell him all," said Robert, huskily. "For God's sake do not break his heart for so trifling a cause as this!"

Mabel's cheeks crimsoned, her eyes fell to the ground.

"I have told him," she murmured "within this hour. Oh, Robert, Robert! have I said too much?"

"My May, my own darling!" cried Dale. "And to think that this miserable, false pride of mine failed to measure the nobility of your virtue!"

When Florrie came down from the observatory to the marble sun-dial, where the minutes were measured off by sunshine—ah, how appropriate it seemed just now, this division of time!—Bob and Mabel were sitting side by side on a rustic bench, and there was something in their faces that betrayed the truth at once.

Mabel's lips dimpled into a soft shy smile. Bob drew Florrie toward him at once.

"You have discovered our secret, little sister," said he.

Florrie uttered a cry of joy.

"Oh, May!" she said, "is it Bob?"

"Could it be any one else than Bob?" Mabel whispered, her sweet eyes full of loving light.

And then Florence, the mendacious little gipsy, declared that she had known it all along. It wasn't a bit of a surprise to her. Everybody had seen it but Bob; and Love was proverbially blind.

"You didn't treat Smithers very well after he resigned from the presidency of your club."

"Why? What did we do?"

"You posted a notice that 'an election would be held to fill the vacancy formerly occupied by Mr. Smithers.'"

Fair Enthusiast—What a dear little picture; it's just too sweet for anything! Can you make out the name of the artist, Mr. Cadmium? It looks like "Ochre." Cadmium (recognizing picture by a rival)—Humph! Medi ocre, I guess."

Mrs. Spankwell (to shoe dealer) —"May I try these slippers before I take them?"

Shoe dealer—"Why, certainly, ma'am."

"Mrs. Spankwell (catching her hopeful over her knee)—"Yell kinder easy, Johnny. Tain't as if we was nice and cosey at home, you know.

Judge—"Are you guilty or not guilty?"

Prisoner—"Not guilty."

Judge (to witness)—"How much was the stolen watch worth?"

Witness—"Your Honor, it was worth $150.

Prisoner (taking the watch from his pocket)—"That shows he can't be believed. Do you think that watch is worth $150."

Weeping Relative (of very sick statesman.)—"Doctor, is there no hope?"

Experienced Physician—"Only one. We must induce the newspapers to put his obituary in type."

A small boy's composition on "Umbrellas" states that "Umbrellas were introduced in the rain of George the Third, which was a disastrous one in many particulars, being the time when the Declaration of Independence was signed by the 400 and about the date when George Washington could not tell a lie."

Wife (reproachfully)—"You married me for my money?"

Husband (suavely)—"No, my dear, you forget—you hadn't inherited it then. I only took the chances."

Mistress—You are so stupid. I told you to pay attention when the milk boiled over.

Servant—And I did, mum. It was a quarter past 8, mum, by the clock when it boiled over.

Giles—It seems dreadfully extravagant to go to such an expensive tailor.

De Jinks—What could I do? He was the only one that would trust me.

Nothing is so contagious as example; we are never either much good or much evil without imitators.

Wickedness may prosper for a while; but in the long run, he who sets knaves at work will pay them.

Among the 800,000 Hebrews in New York city there is not a saloon keeper. Among the Irish and Germans they are plenty as flies around a swill tub in July.

The monument erected in the State House grounds at Indianapolis in honor of the late Vice President Hendricks was formally unveiled on the 1st inst.

With a big steal by the late cashier in the New York post office, and another one lately in the Cincinnati post office, the grand old party is blossoming.

A woman in Ohio not long since lost a child through diphtheria, and forced her other children to kiss the dead body. They all grew sick with the same disease and died.

Superintendent of the Census Porter estimates from the returns already reported that the population of the United States and the Territories will reach 64,500,000 against 50,155,783 in 1880.

A company has been organized in this State which will capitalize and place upon the market 3,800 acres of land near the White Sulphur Springs. The land embraces the celebrated [illegible] Creek property.

The rescuing party has at last penetrated into the Hill Farm mine at Dunbar, Pa., but found the mine full of fire, smoke and fire damp; the buckets of two of the miners and a blower were found, but they themselves doubtless perished in the flames long ago.

Careful estimates place the number of pensioners added to the rol under the Dependent Pension bill at 300,000. It will require 400 new clerks to take care of the new accounts.

Yes, a man has a right to lend his newspaper or magazine to all his neighbors, and the right to lend his tooth pick and marriage certificate, but if he desires the editor and publisher for whom he professes friendship, to succeed, he will ask those who come to borrow, to subscribe. Any paper worth taking is worth efforts to extend its circulation.

The Secretary of the Interior asks for $[illegible] with which to pay surgeons who are to examine applicants under the new pension bill, $[illegible] to pay the extra force of clerks required by the bill, and $[illegible] for incidental things too numerous to mention. Twenty five years after the war closed the total pension expenses foot up nearly $[illegible] a year, and at this rate, in 25 years more will foot up nearly $[illegible].

The steamer Rotterdam, which arrived in New York Sunday, brought the largest single consignment of Sumatra tobacco ever received there—4,750 bales, valued at $1,000,000. Manufacturers are hurrying in a stock before the Tariff bill becomes a law and the duty on the Sumatra leaf goes up.

Pittsburgh furnishes the latest novelty in attempts at suicide. A mother and daughter fasten themselves in a room, turn on the gas full blast and light it for the purpose of smothering themselves in the heat. Any one who would adopt that plan in torrid weather like the present must be in deadly earnest.

The weather expert of the New York Herald, after noting the hot wave as unprecedented in length for so early in the summer, adds these words of comfort: "At any rate, the present high American temperatures cannot be taken to portend an abnormally protracted and severe summer. The outlook rather favors an early than a late fall."

The estimated population in some of the most important cities is as follows: New York, 1,627,227; Brooklyn, 900,000; Chicago, 1,214,000; Philadelphia, 1,046,447; Boston, 417,720; Baltimore, 438,000; St. Paul, 180,000; New Orleans, 236,300; St. Louis, 430,000; Kansas City, 125,000. These figures may be somewhat increased or reduced by the final report.

In an interview with the Rochester Union (Dem.) Bob Ingersoll says: "I believe protecting what are called the infant industries, but after these 'infants' get to be six feet high and wear No 12 boots boots it is about time to stop rocking the cradle, especially when the 'infant' tells you that if you stop rocking he will get out of the cradle and kick your head off."

A political sensation has been caused in West Virginia by the announcement of the "flop" of President Carr, of the State Senate, from the Republican to the Democratic party. Carr is one of the most influential men in the State. He was elected to the Senate four years ago as a Labor Republican, and was the hero of the famous deadlock in 1889, which lasted four weeks and resulted in his election to the Presidency of the Senate. He announces that he leaves the Republican party on the tariff question.—National Democrat.

Charles H. J. Taylor, a negro lawyer, of Atlanta, who was Minister to Liberia during the Cleveland Administration, proposes to take the colored voters of the United States over to the Democratic party in a body. Taylor has perfected a plan for a convention, to be held in Atlanta next month, to be composed of one colored delegate from each State in the Union. The purpose of the convention, as announced by Taylor, is to decide upon the best plan of preparing figures to prove to the negroes of the country that they have never received any favors from the Republican party and never will receive any. In an interview with the New York Sun correspondent Mr. Taylor said that he has visited a number of States, North and South, in the interest of his plan and everywhere finds most of the educated and intelligent negroes in full sympathy with the movement. They begin to realize, he says, that they can never hope to be more than mere voting machines while they remain in the Republican party, and that their real friends are the Democrats. Taylor thinks fully 1,000,000 negro voters will vote the Democratic ticket at the next national election.

Speaking of Bores.

The mild and inoffensive type of bore is more formidable than the able and aggressive one.

From the last named, refuge can be sought in flight, or belligerent opposition may work relief. No one, however, dreams of escaping the placid bore, and anger is out of the question.

The energetic bore is an irritant and does not leave one in a state of exhaustion. The cheerful and passive bore wastes one's flesh, reduces the spirits to hopeless dejection, and smiles with severe idiocy at your death gasps. This minister of marasmus is a respectable member of society, and has access to its most exclusive circles.

No one violently abuses the placid bore, or even hints at the miraculous mental inertia by which he or she prostrates victims right or left. All accept the situation as one of the mysterious dispensations of Providence, and the doctors congratulate themselves on having such a missionary capable of defeating all the sanitary blessings of climate, wholesome diet, rest and exercise.

The placid bore attains a ripe old age, and attends the funerals of those who have succumbed.

Wayside Notes.

The last Sabbath of June is to be remembered in the annals of the Mary Gibson, memorial Chapel on Elk. It was arranged to spend the day in social and religious enjoyment. The morning clouds portended rain, but the sequel proved most auspicious for the occasion, and a very lovely Sabbath day was vouchsafed, the immense throngs gathering from every direction. The scene was charmingly picturesque that presented itself as parties in carriages, wagons and on nice horses and afoot traversed the roads and mountain passes converging on the elegant house of worship the ornament and pride of this one of the most charming of vales amid the forest clad mountains. The birds were singing in the leafy groves, herds and flocks roamed the pastures, the hills and the mountains appeared in greenest foliage, while over all the serene and beautiful skies were lowly bending as if Heaven was willing to meet us more than half the way.

When composed for worship, and the writer looked over the audience a pathetic and peculiar feeling touched his heart, as he observed something in the general expression so earnest and expectant as to indicate that deep down in the hearts of the people something mysteriously wonderful is at work. The recess was spent in the enjoyment of a most delicious and ample repast, prepared by willing and skilful hands, and in social amenities. Then came the afternoon service interspersed with singing beautiful Hymns. A number of gentlemen and ladies by request occupied seats near each other and led the singing in a most satisfactory manner, and their services added very much to the interest of the occasion. Early in the afternoon all repaired to their homes, after hearing that were it not for the bible and bible people, there never would have been a successful declaration of Independence, nor a free and happy American people. The people were moreover reminded that there was something within their reach, more to be desired than gold, yea much fine gold.

In one of the discourses, an illustration of what bibles truth has accomplished, was drawn from a remarkable relic of aboriginal or prehistoric worship, once celebrated in this valley. In a beautiful meadow near the Chapel, is a sacred circle formed of two gigantic serpents in the act of mutually devouring each other. One of these serpents symbolizes the day, the other, night. The succession of day and night makes up the mysterious something, which to the mind of the untutored people, who once claimed this region as theirs is that which makes and keeps alive, or which destroys all things that live and grow or that decay and die. The trend of this part of the Elk valley is so nearly east and west, that the sun of noon on his journey from horizon to horizon is just over the spot chosen for this sacred symbol.

Everything indicates, that this has been a holy place where prehistoric worshippers would meet to their dark and solemn rites and repeat their mysterious incantations. No doubt scenes of thrilling interest transpired here on this holy ground as warriors with loudest cries implored safety in pending wars, or hunters desiring the supreme powers to grant good success in the chase essential to their very existence.

The peculiar grass that forms and makes this strange symbol, grows no where else in all this region, and must have been brought from elsewhere. How very impressive the contrast of the past and present. Once the devout and worshipful solemnly assembled about that strange symbol of mutually devouring serpents gigantic and terrible monsters, inspiring feelings of the most awful character, and in their worship chanted strange rites and forms of words.

To day however the worshipping throngs that assemble in this valley reverentially, quietly and thoughtfully gather around an open book, containing words expressive of ideas brought from Heaven by our Lord Jesus Christ, for the purpose of securing the highest good of humanity.

As a concluding reflection let it be remembered that to those who approved the services of that last Sabbath of June, and now feel more inclined than ever to have supreme regard for God's will and a mutual regard for a neighbors welfare, the services were brought with blessing otherwise a fruitless ordinance.

State Senator.

We clip the following from the Greenbrier Independent.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—It is conceded that Pocahontas county is entitled to the State Senator for the forthcoming term—Hon. M. Van Pelt, whose term of office is about to expire, retiring. Capt. Wm. L. McNeel has served this Senatorial district several terms to the satisfaction of his constituents, and we suggest that if he should consent to become a candidate for the Senatorship, he would meet with a hearty endorsement in each and all the counties composing the 8th Senatorial district.

A DEMOCRAT.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for re-election at the next election as Clerk of the Circuit and County Courts of Pocahontas county.

Feeling very grateful for past favors, and soliciting your support at the next election, I am,

Most respectfully,
JOHN J. BEARD.

To the voters of Pocahontas County.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for Clerk of the County Court of Pocahontas County at the election to be held on the 4th day of November next, and, if elected, I pledge myself to discharge the dutie of said offices to the best of my ability.

Your support is solicited.

Respectfully,
S. L. BROWN.

To the voters of Pocahontas County.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the office of Clerk of the County Court of Pocahontas County subject the action of the Democratic Primary election. Your patronage is kindly solicited.

Very truly yours,
E. H. MOORE.

To the Voters of Pocahontas County.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the office of Sheriff. Election Nov. 4th, 1890.

Respectfully,
J. C. ARBOGAST.

To the Voters of Pocahontas County.

Died—Miss Bettie Hogsett.

Miss Bettie Hogsett, sister of Mr. J. T. Hogsett, near Mill Point and Mr. W. P. Hogsett, of Brown's creek died at the home of the latter brother, on last Saturday 5th inst., aged 57 years. She was born in Huntersville, and was known by every body in this vicinity, and nearly every body in the county. She had been a member of the church almost since childhood, and has lived an amiable christian life, and liked by all.

Mrs. Susan Burr.

Mrs. Susan Burr, wife of the late Wm. Burr, died at her home on Brown's mountain on the 4th inst., aged about 53 years. She was paralyzed several months ago, from which she never recovered. She was a member of the church, and a pure christian lady, a kind wife and mother, and a generous neighbor, loved by all who knew her. She leaves a little boy about 11 years old and a host of relatives and friends to mourn her loss.

Lodged in Jail.

Alfred Pritt, of Droop mountain, was lodged in jail at this place last week, charged with breaking in the dwelling house of Mr. Thos. Callison, and stealing about $9.00.

Also Thos L. Scott, of the same place was locked up for stealing $2.00 from Howard McCoy.

Outrage in Fayette County.

On the 30th inst., about four o'clock, a negro entered the residence of Mr. John W. Walker, near Crickmer, Fayette county, and finding no one at home but Mrs. Walker, he asked her if she was not alone. She became alarmed, and thinking to scare him away, replied that her husband was upstairs. He immediately drew a revolver and ran upstairs, and not finding any one returned and knocked Mrs. Walker down, outraged her, and then bursted open one or two trunks in search of a large sum of money supposed to be in the house. Not finding the money he took quite a number of papers, including deeds, bonds, receipts, etc., and departed. In appearance he was about 6 feet 2 inches in height and well proportioned, and had two scars on the right cheek, also a scar on the forehead. He wore a white wool hat.—Independent.

CAMP-FIRE STORIES.

Grant and Lee have had their first stuggle in the Wilderness, as the former seeks a new road to Richmond. Amidst dense thickets in lonely fields, along narrow highways, in the somber forests, a hundred thousand men have fought backwards and forwards, from sun to sun, and now the night has come to shift the scene. There are 8,000 men lying dead on this battle ground. There are thousands more lying wounded—parching with thirst, crying out in their agony. Lee still thirst, crying out in their agony. Lee still blocks the road, but no sooner has the sun gone down than Grant begins a movement by the left flank to pass. If you can not cross a swamp you must pass around it. My division is one left between the two armies to hide this movement. When morning comes we shall be far in rear. The ground where we rest is broken. There is forest and thicket—a narrow highway—a creek—two or three small farms with their buildings filled with wounded men. Fifty rods in front of a log house is our picket line. It skirts the cleared land and runs away into the darker woods on a straight line. The neutral ground between us and the enemy is a strip not over forty rods wide.

At ten o'clock on this night, when the confusion and turmoil have grown quiet, but while lanters flash here and there through the woods, as men search for the wounded, I am left on "post No. 7" for the coming two hours. My place is under a pine tree which stands in the cleared ground, and all along the front is the dark forest—so dark that a white horse might stand within one hundred feet of me and escape observation. It is a starlight night, but clouds are drifting across the sky and the wind comes in that gusty way which warns you that a storm is brewing at a distance.

For an hour there is no alarm. Grant is moving by the flank. Lee is moving to checkmate him. Grant has left a line to mask his movement. Lee has left a line to mask his. It has been a long, terrible day. Darkness brings a respite to all. We have virtually said to each other over the neutral ground:

"Let us alone and we won't disturb you."

At eleven o'clock a noise in the dark woods in front sends my blood leaping. It was the noise of footsteps breaking dry twigs. There are wounded horses wandering about, but this was not the footstep of a horse. Wounded men may be seeking our lines, but I listen in vain to catch a groan or a low call of distress.

"Step! Step! Step!"

The sound is on my left front. Some one is moving to get the shelter of the darker spot directly opposite. He is moving carefully, but I can follow every foot of progress.

"Step! Step! (Halt!) Step! Step!" (Silence!)

Is it a ghoul seeking out the dead and wounded to rob them? Is it a picket from the other line seeking to locate our posts and report how far away we are? Is it some human devil seeking to dabble his hands in blood after the horrors of the day? Men who had brothers or friends killed in battle by daylight sometimes swore fearful vengeance, and went out upon the bloody field at night to secure it.

"Rustle! Step! (Halt!) Step! Step!" (Coming closer!)

If I raise an alarm here it will go up and down the line and arouse a thousand men in a moment. If let this unknown approach me I may be assassinated. He can not see me in this gloom, but he is slowly approaching in a direct line.

"Halt! Who goes there?"

Deep silence.

If he was a struggler from our lines or a wounded man he would make answer.

"Step! Step!" And now I hear him sink down to the earth.

"Who goes there?"

Silence.

"Who goes there?"

Silence.

I am waiting with musket raised and finger on the trigger. I have given fair warning. Friend could ask no more, and an enemy must realize his danger. As I wait a something makes a blot on the darkness. It is only a few feet away and I fire point-blank. There is one long shrill scream of agony, and I hear a body fall to the earth, and then there is deep silence for a moment.

"What is it?" ask the corporal of the guard as he hurries up from the reserve stationed scarcely one hundred feet in the rear.

"There—I've shot some one!"

The alarm runs up and down the lines to die away after five minutes, and then we advance to the object. The corporal is there first. He reaches out to touch, it draws back in alarm, and gasps: "Great Heavens, but you have shot a woman!"

It was true. Some poor soul, crazed by the terrible sounds of battle—driven from her humble home—hiding in some thicket until darkness came. Then, dumb as the trees around her, but guided by instinct, she sought to make her way back to the house—no doubt the very hut filled with our wounded and suffering men. And she was dead at my feet—dead of my own bullet.

EAME'S LEGACY.

Charles Eames stepped into the office of his friend Bowles, editor of the Glenville Courant.

"How are you, Eames?" asked the editor.

"I ought to feel happy, I suppose," said the young man, a little ruefully, "for I've just received a notice of a legacy."

"Indeed, I congratulate you."

"Wait till you hear what it is."

"Well, what is it?"

"My Aunt Martha has just died, leaving fifty thousand dollars."

"To you? I congratulate you heartily."

"No, she leaves it to a public institution. She leaves me only her silver watch, which she has carried for forty years."

"How is that?"

"She didn't approve of my becoming an artist. She wished me to be a merchant. If I had consulted her wishes, I should, doubtless, have been her sole heir. This small legacy is meant more as an aggravation than any thing else."

"But you can make your own way."

"I can earn a scanty living at present. I hope to do better by and by. But you know my admiration for Mary Brooks. If I had been Aunt Martha's sole heir, I could have gained her father's consent to our marriage. Now it is hopeless."

"I am not so sure of that. This legacy may help you."

"An old watch! You are joking."

"Not if you will strictly observe my directions."

"What are they?"

"Simply this: Agree for one calendar month not to mention or convey the least idea of the nature of your aunt's bequest. I will manage the rest."

"I don't at all know what you mean, Bowles," said the young artist; "but I am in your hands."

"That is all I wish. Now remember to express surprise at nothing; but let matters take their course."

"Very well."

In the next issue of the Glenville Courant the young artist was surprised to read the following paragraph:

"We are gratified to record a piece of good luck which has just befallen our esteemed fellow-citizen the promising young artist, Charles Eames. By the will of an aunt recently deceased, he comes into possession of a piece of property which has been in the family for many years. Miss Eames is reported to have left fifty thousand dollars.

"Really," thought the young man, "anybody would naturally suppose from this paragraph that I had inherited my aunt's entire property."

He put on his hat and walked down the street. He met Ezekiel Brooks, president of the Glenville National Bank.

Mr. Brooks beamed with cordiality.

"My dear sir, permit me to congratulate you," he said.

"You have read the Courant?" said Eames.

"Yes, and I am delighted to hear of your good fortune. Can I speak to you on business a moment?"

"Certainly, Mr. Brooks."

"You'll excuse my advice, but I know you are not a business man as I am. My young man do you want to make some money?"

"Certainly; I should be glad to do so."

"James Parker has five hundred shares of the Wimbledon railway. It stands at fifty-six, a figure much below the real value. Parker is nervous and w[illegible] sell out. I want you [illegible] his entire stock."

"But Mr. Brooks—"

"I know what you would say. It may go down—but it won't. I have advices that a speedy rise is almost certain. Buy him out, and you'll make a handsome thing of it."

"But how shall I find the money?"

"Of course you haven't recieved your legacy. I know there are delays. No trouble about that. Give your note on ninety days, and I'll indorse it. You'll sell out before that time at a handsome advance."

"I will place myself in your hands, Mr. Brooks, but you must manage the buisness."

"Certainly; I shall only want your signature when the documents are made out. By the by come around and dine with us, or have you another engagement?"

Another engagement? Had Eames fifty engagements he would have broken them all for the privilege of meeting Mary Brooks. This was the first time he had been invited to the capitalist's table. The fact is, until this morning, Mr. Brooks had scarcely vouchsafed him more than a cool nod on meeting; but had changed, or appeared to, and his behavior altered with it. Such is the way of the world!

It was a very pleasant dinner. The young artist remained afterwards.

"I have an engagement, Mr. Eames," said Mr. Brooks, "a meeting of the bank directors; but you mustn't go away. Mary will entertain you."

The young man did not go away and apparently was satisfied by the entertainment he recieved. He blessed his aunt for her legacy, if only it had procured him this afternoon's interview with the young lady he had admired. But it gained him more. Every four days he recieved a similar invitation. He could not fail to see that Ezekiel Brooks looked with evident complacency on the good understanding between his daughter and himself.

"What will he say?" thought the young man, "when he finds out what sort of a legacy I have received from my aunt?"

Occasionally, too, he felt nervous about his hasty assent to the proposition to buy four hundred shares of railroad stock at fifty-six, when he hadn't fifty dollars ahead. He reckoned up one day what his purchase would amount to, and his breath was almost taken away when he found it amounted to twenty eight thousand dollars! Still, it had been in a manner forced upon him. He asked no questions, but every now and then the old gentleman said: "All going well! Stock advancing rapidly."

With that he was content. Indeed, he was so carried away by love of Mary Brooks that he gave little thought to any other subject.

One day Mr Brooks came up, his face beaming with joy.

"Wish you joy, Eames," he said. "Wimbledon's gone up [illegible] rocket to par. Give me [illegible] with and I'll sell out for you [illegible] was no one

The artist did so, [illegible] so far as what it meant till [illegible], whose body recieved a little [illegible] hours later by

Charles Eames read this letter three times before he could realize its meaning. Could it be that without investing a cent he had made over twenty thousand dollars? It must be a dream, he thought.

But when he called at the old gentleman's office, he found it was really true.

"Mr. Eames, how about this money? Shall I re-invest it for you?"

"Thank you sir. I wish you would. I should like a little in hand, however."

"Certainly. Will that answer?" and the old gentleman wrote a check for five hundred dollars and placed it in the young man's hand.

It was more money than he had ever before possessed at one time. This was convincing proof of the reality of his good fortune.

The next day he went to the city and ordered a handsome suit of clothes at a fashionable tailor's. The fact was his old coat was getting threadbare, and his overcoat decidedly seedy. While he was about it he bought a new coat and boots, as well as other needed articles, and still returned with money enough in his pocket to make him feel rich. He changed his boarding house, engaged a handsome room at a much nicer boarding-house.

"It seems to me you are dashing out, Eames," said his friend, the editor. "You know I've had a legacy," said Eames, laughing.

"I begin to think you have," said the editor.

When Eames appeared on the street in his new suit it was a confirmation of the news of his inheritage. His removal to fashionable boarding-house was additional confirmation. It was wonderful how he rose in the estimation of people who had before looked upon him as a shiftless artist.

All at once it occurred to him: "Why shouldn't I propose for Mary Brooks? With twenty thousand dollars I could certainly support her comfortably. There was a very pretty cottage and tasteful grounds for sale at five thousand dollars. This would make a charming home."

One morning with considerable trepidation, young Eames broached the subject to Mr. Brooks.

"No one I would like better for a son-in-law, if Mary is willing," was the prompt answer.

Mary was willing, and as there seemed no good reason for waiting, the marriage took place within a few weeks.

"Charles," said his father-in-law after the young people retur[ned] from their wedding journey, [illegible] time for me to render you [an ac]count of your money affairs [illegible] been lucky in my invest[ments] I have thirty-one thou[sand] to your cr[edit] [illegible] amount [illegible] six [illegible] ment, might be increased. THE WEST VIRGINIA ROBBERY COMPLETE.

The Republican Committee on Elections on the 18th reported its decision in the Alderson-McGinnis case and, of course, it was that the Democrat should be unseated and the Republican given the seat.

This is plain, bold robbery and nothinge lse. It completes the piratical programme so far as West Virginia is concerned.

The proof furnished by Mr. Alderson that he was legally elected is inconstrovertible and positive. But what care Quay's and Reed's slavish and consciencless tools for that! After the sins againt the people they have already committed, one more or less matters but little. The thief has been unmasked and brought to bay and there is nothing left but to boldly fight it out on that line, casting all pretensions to the winds and relying on simple violence and further robberies to make his position good.

In our telegraphic dispatches a brief history of the case is presented. None of the facts therein can be denied for they are matters of legal record. There is more of a certainty that John D. Alderson received the majority of the legal votes cast in the Third West Virginia district, than that Reed, himself, was the choice of the honest voters of his district. The Republicans know this, and their long delay shows that the robbery was a difficult one, and could only be done by actual violence and openly. Besides, there was the necessity of "vindicating" Goff. A confession ... Alderson was the legally elected ... for Congress, would have ... confession of the other ... Goff was not elected Gov... Virginia, and the ... declared all along ... a renom... doubt be ... unsan... giv... and ...

... fused to adopt the shameless methods of the speaker of the House; and nothing but debate on that subject has yet been done.

Mr. Blaine has had to bring down the lash on the majority of the Senate, to keep it straight. He does it through an open letter to Mr. Frye. He denounces the McKinley tariff bill, and says "it will not open a market for another bushel of wheat or another barrel of pork."

In the House a bill appropriating $636,180 for an additional clerical force, numbering 636 for the Pension Bureau, was called Mr. Enloe, of Tenn., thought that before any increase of force be granted the Pension Bureau, it should be ascertained whether the charges brought against the present Commissioner were true. It had been alleged that the Pension office was corrupt from top to bottom; and he himself believed the office reeking with corruption in every department. He declared that every other department bureau was open to investigation, and was conducted on business principles. About that bureau there appeared to be something sacred, or something rotton; and in his opinion, the reason the bureau had not been investigated, was because of a desire to conceal the rottenness which was known.

Mr. Cooper, of Indiana, said that facts had come to his knowledge which substantiated the rumors which had been circulated in the newspapers respecting the Commissioner of Pensions. He was ready to prove before a competent committee that the charges were true. He expected to prove that the Commissioner of Pensions had outrageously sold out a ruling in behalf of a firm of pension attorneys in Washington. He was favorable to the appropriation made by the bill; but he believed that if the Commissioner of Pensions would devote the time for which the government paid him to discharge the duties of his bureau, instead of becoming president and chief manager of a refrigerating institution, based, possibly, on no substancial foundation, there would be no necessity for so considerable a number of clerks. "The bureau should be administered honestly, and I charge before the country that this is not the case at present, and investigation will show it.

During this discussion Mr. McKinley got in a severe slap on the hard cheek of Speaker Reed. A few days before Speaker Reed had arrogated to himself the powers of a grand jury. Mr. Cooper had made his charges against the Commissioner in the House, and was cited to appear before the Committee on Rules, to show cause why he had offered the resolution to investigate the Commissioner's office. Mr. Cooper was reluctant to go before this committee on Rules, as there was no reason why he should be expected to go before a secret committee, where he could call for neither persons or papers, and be ...ked to prove charges against ...mmissioner Raum which were a ... of newspaper notoriety. He ... was purely a device to make ... his hand. But realizing ... Speaker Reed's tac... it possible ... inquiry, af... ...sion of ... con... asked ... would ... 's

Reed's arbitrary method of dealing with public questions. A stenographer had taken down Representative Cooper's statement, and when he asked for a record thereof, he was informed that he could not have one.

Well—Mr. McKinley, on taking the floor, said that owing to serious illness his family he had not been able to attend the above mentioned meeting of the Committee on Rules. So far as any investigation of Gen. Raum was concerned if any gentleman would rise in his place and charge irregularities or corruption, or dishonestly or unfair dealing on the part of the Commissioner—that would be sufficient reason for him to give his vote for an investigation.

The bill was passed Saturday by the House, after a great discussion.

District Conventions.

The Democrats of Pocahontas County must not forget that next Saturday, July 26th, is the day appointed for the District Conventions.

The work to be done by each of these District Conventions is to appoint three delegates to each of the following Conventions, viz:

The Congressional, which meets at Hinton, Aug. 27; The State which meets at Grafton and the Joint Convention of Pocahontas and Webster Counties, which meet at Huntersville at a time yet to be fixed, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the Legislature. Of course, if any District sees propto do so it may send the same men to two or more of these Conventions. These meetings are important and no Democrat should fail to attend. "Speak now, or forever hereafter hold your peace."

Most people labor under the impression that Miss Winnie Davis is the only daughter of Jefferson Davis. There is another, Margaret, the elder, who is the wife of J. A. Hayes, of Colorado Springs.

About 66,000,000 is what it is estimated the census will show to be the population of the country. But if reports are half true a good many folks have been left out of what Mr. Mantilini would call "the demnition total."

A terrible cyclone swept over the city of St. Paul, Minn., and vicinity on the 13th. The steamer Sea Wing was capsized on Lake Pepin and about 125 passengers perished. Cottages at the summer resorts were crushed like eggshells, buildings and trees leveled, and many other persons killed and injured. It is expected that the total loss of life will reach 200.

Buena Vista's Pluck.

A dispatch from Buena Vista says that the Buena Vista Company have already made arrangement to erect a new hotel on site of the recently burned building. Mr. Pettyjohn, of Lynchburg, is to be the contractor. The new building will be of brick and larger than the former one, and that in the meantime the company, is arranging to open the Colonnade Hotel, containing forty-eight rooms, which will be completed in ten days. Visitors are being accommodated by the numerous boarding houses in the town, and no one need stay away for fear of not being taken care of.

More lots were sold on the day following the fire than on any day for two weeks previously, three of them averaging $120 a front foot in price. So far from being discouraged the people of the town have only been stimulated to greater activity by their first misfortune.—Valley Virginian.

Trailed by His Blood.

Special Telegram to the Wheeling Register.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., July 14. Melville Rader, a young married man of about 30 years, was found dead last Friday in the garden of a man by the name of Buchanan, who lives in Webster county, at the mouth of Sugar creek, on the back fork of Elk river. He had a bullet wound in his left breast near the heart, and was tracked by a trail of blood from Buchanan's house into the garden, where he was found after being dead, evidently about three hours. Although the facts connected with his death are known, still there are circumstances which point strongly to a party named Bill Coe. Coe and Buchanan had married sisters, but Coe and his wife had not lived happily and Mrs. Coe left her husband to live with Buchanan. Rader, who is a married man is said to have conceived a strong affection for Mrs. Coe and to have avowed his intention of taking her from her sister unto himself. Be this as it may, he went on the fatal Friday to the house of Buchanan, where he found the two women. Later Coe came to the house and after remaining awhile was seen to leave the place in company with the two women. There was no one else about the place, so far as known, except Rader, whose body was found a few hours later by some lumbermen, who were working in the neighborhood. The murder seems to have been a deliberate and atrocious one and feeling runs high in this neighborhood.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.,

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 4.—The atrocious Lodge Federal election bill has been adsolutely forced through the House by Speaker Reed, and it was the hardest job which he has yet undertaken, and which it is pretty certain that he has no desire to repeat, as willing as he usually is to force a fight or take a part in a skirmish. After all the talk about republicans voting against the Federel election bill in the House there were only two—Coleman of Louisiana' and Lehlback, of N. J.—who actually did vote against it. The others known to be opposed to it, and there were enough of them to have easily defeated the bill could not stand the presure which boss Reed brought to bear on them to swallow their opinions and vote for the bill. Several of these men have since stated that they would not have voted for the bill if they had not been ascured that it would die in the Senate.

Mr. Blaine was asked, just before he left for Bar Harbor, Maine, yesterday, what he thought of the Federal law's passing the House. He laughed and said "that's as far as it will ever get".

The excuses of republicans were well represented in a speech by Mr Houk, of Tenn. this week. He said that his advocacy of a national election law did not grow out of any supposed emergency or necessity. But he thought it inconsistent with logic to leave to the states, the control of the election of national officers. A national election law could in no possible way promote his fortunes. In his district elections were fair, and the democrats didn't want it otherwise. In the 2nd district of Tenn., any false counting or stuffing would bring the perpetrators to the penitentiary.

Mr. Coleman said that from principle and conviction he had been elected to the House as a republican; but he was opposed to the enactment of a federal election law at this time. He would heartily favor a national election law if it would assist in purifying elections; but that the supposition that such a measure would have such an effort, was based upon false impressions and upon an ignorance of the South. The memories of the reconstruction period should should not be stirred up.

After a lot of republican amendments to the bill had been offered, Mr. Lehlback, of New Jersey, presented one that was true to the point and elicited great applause from the democrats, but was coldly recieved by the republicans.

It provided that the chief supervisor of election, for each judicial district shall take such action as is required to assure such supervision in each Congressional district in the United States. He desires to have the law made uniform throughout the whole country. If it was desirable to control congressional elections by National Government, "let it be applied to every district alike."

In short the Federal Election bill is a measure intended to give another lease of life to the republican party. Mr. Blaine practically said, that if the McKinley bill passes, the party may as well write its last will and testament. He has no sympathy with the reckless audacity of his party. He boldly asserts that he won't stand it. He is willing to follow or lead his party to larger national prosperty; but when he sees it rushing headlong into irretrievable folly he refuses to share its fate. He is roundly denounced by the school boys, but the old master has determined to preserve order.

The democrats have themselves to thank for the defeat of Friday, when Mr. Lehlbacks amendment was offered. They deserted their posts and were not present when the vote was called. Mr. Carlisle thinks that the conduct of the democrats was disgraceful, and that the body acted like a drunken man unfit for business. Mr. McKinley was overcome with delight. But the whole matter ended Saturday afternoon in fillibustering by the republicans, to gain time and the republican papers here acnkowledge that fact. The South won't stand the terrors of military authority, and the administration knows it.

The House has refused to allow the Senate to increase the pay of its committee clerks from $6 a day, during the session to $1,800 per annum, although the Senate conferees made a long and stubborn fight for the amendment.

A HAND IN THE DARK.

BY MRS. ETTA F. MARTIN.

"Lucky fellow!"

The words involuntarily passed my lips as I threw myself into the luxurious easy chair drawn up temptingly before the open grate. They applied equally to Tom and myself. Tom was a lucky fellow, certainly—the master of the grange and the husband of a charming woman—and I counted myself almost equally fortunate in my freedom from business cares for three whole weeks, and the prospect of unlimited fishing and driving.

Cousin Tom had recently inherited a fortune; I was still plodding alone in London; but for three weeks of liberty I determined to enjoy all the blessings the gods had vouchsafed me, and to imagine myself, for the nonce, as rich and happy as Tom himself.

Although it was early fall the nights were a little keen, and Constance—Tom's wife—had ordered a a fire in my room, the cheerful blaze giving to the richly furnished apartment a delightful touch of warmth and coziness.

With such a fire and such a chair, and with my favorite evening paper in my pocket, retiring was not to be thought of; so drawing to my chair a table on which stood a shaded lamp I gave myself up to the perusal of my journal.

Over the long parliamentary report I must have gone to sleep and when I awoke the lamp had burned itself out, and but a few sparks remained of the cheery fire. The room was not in total darkness, for there was a moon, hidden by clouds, to be sure but still throwing enough light at the wide windows to make things dimly visible.

On the instant awakening I felt that some one was near me, and, with that startled feeling one has on awakening suddenly from a sound sleep, I cried out:

"Whose there?"

No answer came, and the only sounds were the tapping of a tree branch against the window and the ticking of the clock over the fire place.

Still I was conscious that somebody—something—was near me, and I held my breath, straining my ears to catch some sound that should reveal the intruder, but only the tap of the tree branch and the tick of the clock broke the silence.

I remembered that there were matches on the table, and turned my chair to search for them. An exclamation of astonishment rose to my lips as I did so, for on the surface of the table was a strange luminous spot—neither lamplight firelight or moonlight.

Up to this time my feeling had been one of annoyance rather than fear, but there was something so indescribable, so supernatural, about this light that a sudden terror seized me, and I gazed as one fascinated, unable to move.

A card and pencil I had taken from my pocket lay on the table, and over this the light grew brighter, and in the midst a hand appeared—a woman's hand delicate and beautiful, but of deathly whiteness, and on the third finger gleamed a ruby, the stone held between two golden serpents' heads.

The fingers closed over the pencil, and after making several irregular marks upon the card, letters began to be formed, and as I leaned forward with breathless interest, I saw the pallid hand write with perfect distinctness:

"Search for the box in the old well."

Then the strange light grew dim, the hand gradually faded away and the moon, emrging from the clouds, threw a shaft of light into the room.

The spell that had bound me was broken, and in a moment I had found match and taper, and light in hand, was bending over the table.

The card was blank—not a word upon it—and I asked myself if I had been dreaming; but hard as I tried to convince myself that such was the case I could not; it had all been too real.

A strange experience it was surely, but after pondering over it awhile I decided to dismiss it from my mind and to retire.

In the morning the affair seemed more inexplicable than ever, and I found myself constantly thinking of the words I had seen traced by the mysterious hand. They were meaningless to me. "Search for the box in the old well." I knew of no box that had been lost and certainly I knew of no old well. The affair had a flavor of "Lady Audley's Secret" about it, and it was not hard to picture a grassgrown well concealing in its depths some ghastly secret.

If I could have laughed the matter off as a dream I should have regaled Tom and Constance with the story at breakfast, but I could not bring myself to speak of it.

"By the way, Lester," said Tom, "we are expecting another guest today—Miss Mabel Saunders. Charming girl too."

"And the Grange's rightful mistress," said Constance.

I looked up in surprise.

"I thought you bought the place, Tom, so who could be the rightful mistress but Constance?"

"Only leased it, old fellow. The owner, Lee Harcourt, Hartcourt, would not sell, though he is ashamed to show his face about here. It is my opinion he hopes to come back and marry Mabel when the feeling against him has died away."

"Tell me the story, Tom," I asked, "for that there is a story is evident.

"Easily told, Lester. Mabel Saunders is the daughter of an old army comrade of Colonel Denison, the late owner of the Grange, and when her parents died, in her infancy, Colonel Denison and his wife took the child to their home. She was not legally adopted, but as they had no children of their own Mabel was looked upon as their heiress, and the Colonel's attorney avers that he drew up a will four years ago leaving the property to her. Two years ago Colonel Denison was brought home dead from the hunting field, and his wife, who had been for years an invalid, survived the shock less than a month. When the Colonel's papers were examined no will was found, and Lee Harcourt, the next of kin, came into possession. Many of the Colonel's friends were not slow to express their belief that Harcourt had destroyed the will, as he had been visiting at the Grange at the time of the Colonel's death, but there was no proof. He wanted to marry Mabel, probably to end the gossip, but she refused his hand, and for more than a year now has been governess for Mrs. Stanton's three unruly boys. Now, those precocious youngsters are to have a vacation, so Mabel comes to us. Indeed, we would gladly give her a home, but she is too proud to accept it. There's the story, and now for our drive. Here are the horses."

A glorious gallop it was in the bracing autumnal air, and a visit to the stables followed, so that I did not see Constance till I came down to lunch. Meeting Tom in the hall, we entered the room together, to find Constance awaiting us, and by her side a tall straight girl with the sweetest face I had ever seen.

Tom greeted her warmly, and then Miss Saunders was introduced to me, extending her hand with some pleasant remark.

What she said I do not know, for on the hand that was laid in mine glistened a ruby—a ruby held between two golden serpent's heads.

I must have seemed strangely embarrased for a moment. But I saw Constance look at me oddly, and with a determined effort I put aside all speculations for the time being.

That evening in the drawing room, as Miss Saunders and I were looking over a book of engravings, I seized the opportunity to comment upon the ring, saying I had never seen the design before.

The sweet face grew sad as she answered: "It was my mother's ring. She placed it on my finger the day she died."

By her mother I understood of course that she meant Mrs. Denison, the only mother she had ever known, and I almost seemed to hear the words: "Search for the box in the old well." Could there be any connection between the missing will and my strange vision?

The days went on, every hour bringing me nearer that unhappy day when I must leave the Grange and Mabel and return to my office drudgery. I had often declaimed against sudden attachments, had often argued that love should be a growth, and here were all my theories completely shattered. At a glance from Mabel's blue eyes a flame had been kindled in my heart that grew brighter and brighter as we walked or drove together in the long, pleasant days. Still, I did not I mean to ask her to be my wife, for what had I to offer? Two or three rooms in a dingy London house perhaps. But one evening in the garden, as the moonlight fell upon her upraised face, I lost my head completely and avowed my love, to find it frankly returned. And when I told Mabel how little I had to lay at her feet, she drew such a picture of a little home in London that the two or three shabby rooms became the brightest spot on earth.

Tom and Constance were delighted, and indeed I shrewdly suspect that the whole affair was one of my cousin's wife's match making schemes.

"Ah, Lester," she said, "if that will would only turn up you might have a fortune as well as a bridge. Oh, yes," as I protested that I wanted no fortune. "I know you are disinterested, but you would still love Mabel, would you not, if she were rich?"

"By Jove," said Tom, "it is a shame about that will. Let's have another search for that box."

"The box! What box?" I cried, jumping to my feet in my excitement.

"Why, the tin box the will was in, together with the papers. Didn't I tell you the whole lot were missing?"

For a moment I lost sight of Tom and Constance, and before me I saw a pallid hand, with its gleaming ruby, and it traced the words: "Search for the box in the old well."

I turned squarely upon Tom, who was watching me somewhat curiously.

"Why don't you search the old well?" I asked abruptly.

"It was Tom's turn to jump to his feet.

"The old well! What put that into your head? But it shall be searched before the sun goes down. And, by Jove, Constance, don't you remember when we leased the Grange that Harcourt spoke about the old well as dangerous, and suggested that we have it filled up?"

There was a well, then, and I wanted to ask where; but Tom had taken it for granted that I knew all about its existence, and I did not want to tell them my strange experience on my first night at the Grange. The search might reveal nothing.

Tom would not wait a moment, but hurrying off to the stables, returned with two or three of his men, and marshaled the party to the old well, in a remote corner of the grounds.

The promise of a sovereign to the man who would make the search quickly secured a volunteer, and as he descened, the stones on the sides giving him a foothold, Tom lit a lantern to be lowered to him. The well was quite dry, and if the box was there at all a brief search would discover it.

And we had not long to wait. Soon we heard the man clambering up the well side, and when his head rose above the curb Tom seized him and fairly lifted him out. And there was the tin box protruding from his pocket.

There is little more to tell. The will was found to be uninjured. Lee Harcourt never returned to England, thereby confessing virtually that he had stolen the will, and Mabel in due time was installed as mistress of the Grange.

And I—well, I tried to be magnanimous, and told Mabel I was no match for her and that she was at liberty to break the engagement, whereupon she declared that she would give the property to an orphan asylum and be once more the dowerless girl I had loved and won.

So I became master of the Grange and among our most frequent visitors are Tom and Constance.

Only the other day Tom said, as we were enjoying our after dinner smoke, "That was a bright thought of yours, old fellow, about the well. I am sure no one else would ever have hit upon it."

I thought of the hand in the dark, but I said nothing. After our marriage I told Mabel the story, and we had agreed that it should rest a secret with us.

It was a Boston baby, and the proud mother and father listening delightedly to the praises of their old friend.

"Now, who does he look like?" remarked the visitor, meditatively; it's strange, but the resemblance is singularly striking, and yet I cannot place it distinctly."

Both the parents began to be visibly uneasy.

"Yes, certainly," exclaimed the judge, with enthusiasm, after a pause. "I know it, my dears. Why the child is the exact picture of the bust of Socrates in the Greek Library."

And the smile on the two anxious faces was that bright the rooster half a mile around thought it was daylight and began to crow.

See how a small [illegible] pay. A man, poor but enterprising, paid [illegible] for a revolver. That same evening he earned [illegible] by simply pointing his [illegible] revolver at a man who happened to have the amount specified in his inside pocket.

The property assessment of Norfolk, Va., shows an aggregate of about $20,000,000 against $13,400,000 in 1885.

An another plug tobacco factory is in contemplation at Durham, N. C., by a company with a capital of $250,000.

It is stated that the railroad companies of the country have subscribed to date $665,000 to the stock of the World's Fair.

A diver who was working at the foundation of a railroad bridge near Boise City, Idaho, gave a signal to be hoisted quickly. When he got to the surface he held fast a 65 pound salmon that he had caught by the gills.

Walter Parish, aged twenty-five, of Milton, went into the hardware store of A. Wims, at Catleburg, and asked to see a revolver. One was handed to him, when he placed it to his head and blew his brains out.

The National Bridge property in Virginia has been sold to a Massachusetts and Virginia syndicate for $300,000. It was purchased from H. C. Parsons and Hon. James G. Blaine, who have owned it for a number of years.

The census returns from Wheeling, and vicinity are all in. The population of the city proper is $37,595. Including the suburbs, which are virtually a part of the town, and are included in what is known as "Industrial Wheeling," the increase since 1880 has been about 30 per cent.

The returns from Virginia's new assessment have been recieved from all the State except twelve counties and the cities of Richmond and Norfolk. The total increase in the counties and cities reported is about $15,000,000, and it is believed that the counties yet to send in their figures will show a considerable gain.

Two young men named Oscar Huffman and James Allen were drowned at the mouth of Wolf creek, Summer county. They were in bathing, and Huffman, who was about seventeen years old, got beyond his depth. Allen, aged about twenty-one, went to his assistance, but was caught around the neck by the lad, and both were drowned.

A negro girl about 14 years old and two white boys about 10 and 12 years old went crab fishing at Brunswick, Ga. Their bait giving out, the negro girl took a hatchet and chopped off one of the white boy's toes and used it for a bait. The boys left and came home. The girl, after fishing awhile with the toe, buried it in the sand. She was arrested and placed in jail.

TWO WONDERFUL TWINS.—There are two young artisans of Bristol, named Johnson, who are twins, and between whom the similarity is far more remarkable than in Shakespeare's two Dromios even. Not only are they of the same height and weight having the same colored hair, eyes, and complexion, identical physical measurements, and feeding, walking, running, laughing, crying, singing, and speaking alike, but they are of the same occupation, hold the same position, and have the same religious persuasion and likes and dislikes. More singular still, they have espoused very similar wives, and they have the same number of children, who are of the same sexes, three girls and three boys each.

A WELL OF HONEY.—A successful boring for honey has been made in North Tennessee. For many years swarms of bees have been noticed by boatmen at Fox Bluff, on the Cumberland river, near Franklin, Ky. The bluff is 170 feet high, and the river's channel runs directly under it. The bees have been observed about a big fissure near the center of the bluff, and the opening could not be reached from above or below without great danger of being stung to death. As the bees had never been robbed it was thought a large amount of honey was stored in the cliff. Recently a well-borer named Starks visited the bluff and was at once impressed with the idea that he could reach the wonderful honey storehouse with his drill. After some coaxing he persuaded a number of farmers to undergo the expense, and a three inch hole was bored from the top of the bluff.

At a depth of 85 feet the drill struck the honey. According to a despact, "barrels and tubs by the score were filled and carried off to neighboring farms, and the syndicate has sent to Louisvill for more receptacles.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 25.—

The Southern Senators deprecate boycotting, but decline to talk about it; some of them, for instance Gorman of Maryland and Vance of North Carolina, see nothing in it but the silly vaporings of superheated highly excited imaginations.

Senator Vance said: "I am a Christian, and therefore I do not swear; but if I were a profane man, I should call it the d——st nonsense. We ought to oppose the Force bill by every constitutional and legal means within our power.

If it be passed in spite of us, we should do as the town clerk of Ephesus did, and counsel our people to do nothing rash."

Senator Gorman was equally free in expression. The Maryland Senator is very blunt, and although that manner is liable to offend, it usually carries with it the sincerity of the speaker. He said: "Such utterances are senseless in the extreme. No public man in Washington is in sympathy with such a plan, or would encourage it for a moment. The effect of the passage of such a measure as the Lodge bill would be bad in both sections. It is having its effect already, as a result of the mere agitation of the question."

He said that several Baltimore gentleman had called upon him, who have projected large enterprises in the South. "They told me," he continued," that they would go no further in the matter until the Force bill had been finally disposed of. If the measure passes, they will drop the affair altogether, and similar action will no doubt follow in scores of cases. All talk of a boycott, however, is foolish".

Attention is directed to the Forty Third Congress and the attempt to pass the Force bill when Blaine was Speaker of the House, and B. F. Butler was chairman of the Judiciary committee, which reported the bill to the House. General Wheeler, of Alabama, recently made a great argument against the present bill, and Gen. Butler wrote to him for a copy, as worth preserving, and received an answer as follows: "Upon the question of the constitutional right of Congress, involving its right to take charge of federal elections, in cases of emergency, can, by the U. S. Statutes and constitution be only this: Sec. 4, Chapter 1:

When the State shall refuse or neglect to provide for the election of U. S. Senators and representatives the national legislature may appoint the representatives of the state. But the times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof."

It is a notorious fact that a number of republican senators are disgusted with the Lodge bill, and would say so, but for the trouble such frankness brings. No sooner does a senator say that he deprecates such legislation than he is hounded by a lot of partisans into denying, or modifying, his published expressions. It has become as much as a republican senator's life is worth, to think aloud, contrary to the republican journals in this matter.

Every senator who is reported as being lukewarm is immediately seen; and if he does not authorize a contradiction of any little expression that escaped him, it is contradicted anyhow. It is not strange that under the circumstances senators should, for the sake of peace, keep their views to themselves.

They will not, however, be regulated or subjugated, if ever the time comes, to jump upon the neck of the Lodge bill and choke the life out of it.

Mr. Harrison must have learned something recently which caused him to think his chances of being re-nominated are improving; he has authorized a statement to be made, to the effect that his wife did not accept the cottage at Cape May Point, because he refused to allow her to do it; and that he paid for it with $10,000 of his own money. The effect of this statement would have been greater if it had been made sooner.

The House in obedience to the dictation of Speaker Reed, has passed the Original Package bill, and the National Bankruptcy bill.

The Behring Sea correspondence has been sent to Congress, and the fact is apparent that Mr. Blaine has done nothing but maintain the claims of Mr. Cleveland's administration.

During the coming year the United States will expend $167,000,000 for pension purposes. This exceeds the total amount that Great Britain annually pays out for the support of her army and navy, and is by far the largest sum that any government has ever granted for the relief of its disabled soldiers.

HOME NEWS

—Mr. Andrew Herold, of Frost, called to see us Monday.

—Our farmers are about through with their harvesting.

—Lots of pretty girls called to see us during the Institute.

—Sheriff M. J. McNeel of Mill Point was in the city Tuesday.

—C. O. Arbogast and J. B. Riley of Greenbank are in town.

—Dr. S. P. Patterson's new dwelling has been improved by an extra coat of paint.

—Mr. Wm. T. Campbell, of this place started last Thursday for Elk [illegible] with typhoid fever.

—Attorney C. F. Moore, was up to Dunmore on Monday. We learn his grand-mother Mrs. Arbogast, is lying at the point of death.

—Dr. Campbell, of Monterey, Va., has been here for a week or more doing dental work. He is an excellent dentist and was kept quite busy.

—On account of our limited space one or two communications are crowded out, but will appear next week.

—Our little town has been quite lively for ten days because of the Teachers Institute. About 50 of the intellectual sort have been in attendance.

—We will give the names and grades of the teachers, who attended the examination at this place this week in our next issue.

—We recieved the proceedings of the Democratic Mass meetings of the County this week, held last Saturday and for want of space are crowded out this week, but will appear next.

—On last Saturday evening Mr. D. S. Alderman, left his pocket-book lying in the post office at this place containing $37.0?. Any one picking it up, not knowing whose it was, will be liberally rewarded by leaving it at THE TIMES office.

—"I was troubled with Catarrh for over two years. I tried various remedies, and was treated by a number of physicians, but received no benefit until I began to take Ayer's Sarsarparilla. A few bottles of this medicine cured me."—Jesse M. Boggs, Holman's Mills, N. C.

—Ayer's Cathartic Pills are recomended by the best physicians, because they are free from calomel and other injurious drugs, being composed of purely vegitable ingredients. While thorough in their action, they stimulate and strengthen the bowells and secretory organs.

—The 2nd Quarterly Meeting of Huntersville circuit M. E. Church, South, will be held at Sunset next Sunday and Monday Aug. 3rd and 4th.—Preaching and Sacramental service Sunday afternoon 3:30, and Preaching and Quarterly Conference, Monday morning 11 o'clock conducted by Presiding Elder S. G. Ferguson.

—In this issue will be found the announcement of Capt. C. B. Swecker of Dunmore, for House of Delegates. It is scarcely necessary for us to add more, as the Capt is well known in this county and no doubt will be well recommended to Webster.

—The Teachers Institute which convened in the court house Monday the 21st, was one of the most interesting that has been held in this county for a number of years. We noticed a great many young teachers who enrolled their names for the first time as members of a teachers' Institute and will probably teach their first term of school the coming winter.

—We are pleased to acknowledge pleasant calls from the following ladies, who were in attendance at the Institute and examination:—Misses Grace Clark, Duffie Marshall, Annette Ligon, Emma Burner, Claudia Dysard, Sadie Hamilton, Otie and Nora Riley, Lula Burner, Ida Brown, Effie Sharp, Hattie Patterson; also Alice and Lula Bock, and Ida Brown who were visiting our city.

COMMISSIONER'S SALE OF LAND.

Pursuant to a decree of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, rendered at the June term, 1890, in the cause of C. C. Burner v Wm. N. Morrow, I will on THURSDAY, THE 21 DAY OF AUGUST, 1890,

offer for sale by public auction, at Travelers Repose in said County, that certain tract of land containing 915 acres, lying near the east branch of Greenbrier river, adjoining the lands of Jefferson Houchen, A. M. V. Arbogast and others, being the same land lately sold by the said Burner to the said Morrow.

TERMS: One third of the purchase money cash in hand, and the residue in six and twelve months from the day of sale, in equal payments, bearing interest from that day, the purchaser executing bonds with good security for the deferred payment, and the title being retained as ultimate security.

CHARLES P. JONES, Com'r.

I, John J. Beard, Clerk of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, do certify that the bond required by said decree, has been duly executed.

Huntersville, W. Va.

July 31, 1890.

To The Memory of Rev. J. E. Moore. Died at Mill Point.

We publish the following by request.

Oh father, dear, what power was that which claimed thy fleeting breath?
What made thy frame so cold, thy pulse so still? A whisper answers "Death."
Yes, thou art dead: thy sturdy form now sleeps beneath the sod;
An angel from the throne came down to waft thy spirit back to God,

'Twas in the March of '90, on the twenty-second day,
Just as the sun was kissing noon his spirit fled away.
The frosts of age were thickening fast, his hair was hoary white,
When unto him the Master saith, "Receive thy sparkling crown of light

And tho' we knew that all was well, that Jordan's waves were still,
Yet, oft our grief in tears are shed for him who rests upon the hill.
Oh, what a weight of sorrow came to fill our hearts with gloom,
As we gently laid him down to rest whithin the silent tomb.

Ah, why should I now care to longer live? Joy's dearest gems are gone;
So much of love and life have fled, yet we must still live on.
Yes, we must drink life's bitter cup; the "wormwood and the gall;"
Be with our cheerless lot content till Death hath summoned all.

Gird up thine armor, O, my stricken soul; stretch forth thy quickened power;
E'en yet thy hand may pluck from joys complete a diadem of flowers,
For sympathetic words still come, like balms of Gilead rare,
And twine their tendrills round the heart and shed there sweetest there.

When at last our names are called we'll lay life's armour by,
Like other mournful relics of the past, and dwell with Christ on high.
And when we've joined that heavenly choir, this solace sweet we'll sing:
"O, grave where is thy victory? O, Death, where is thy sting?"

W. B. H. MOORE,

Freeport, Kan., May 5, 1890.

FOUND HIM AT LAST.

We were sitting on the veranda of a hotel at Niagara Falls, when I noticed the man on my right looking sharply at the man on my left, says the New York Sun, and presently he got up in an excited way and walked about. After a bit he halted before the other man and asked:

"Isn't your name Graham?"

"Yes sir," was the prompt reply.

"Didn't you used to teach school at Elmira?"

"Yes, sir."

"In 1863?"

"Yes sir."

"Do you remember a boy named Godkin?"

"Very distinctly sir."

"Do you remember that he put a package of fire crackers under his seat and touched them off?"

"As if it happened only yesterday."

"And you basted him for it?"

"I did. I licked him until he could hardly stand, and I've always been glad of it."

"You have, eh?" said the other, breathing fast and hard. "Do you know that that boy swore a terrible oath?"

"I presume he did, for he was a a thorough young villian."

"He swore that he would grow up and hunt for you and pound you within an inch of your life."

"But I havn't heard from him yet."

"You hear from him now. He stands before you! I am that boy!"

"Well?"

"Prepare to be licked! My time has come at last!"

He made a dive at the old pedagogue, but the latter evaded him, made a half turn and hit him on the jaw, and Godkin went over a chair in a heap. Then the whilom school teacher piled on to him and licked him until he cried "Enough!" and it didn't take him over three minutes to do it. Then he retired to get on another collar and replace some buttons, and I helped Godkin up and observed:

"You didn't wait long enough, I guess."

"Say! That's where I made a miscue!" he replied. "I see now that I ought to have held off until he got to be a 150 years old. He is all of 70 now, but he licked me right off the reel, and I'll never have the sand to stand us to him again. Here's twenty years of waiting for vengeance knocked into a cocked hat in three minutes.

Servant—"Two gentlemen at the door want to see you, ma'am. They didn't come together; just happened to arrive at the same time."

Mistress—"How do they behave?"

"One of 'em is very polite, and begs the honor of a few minutes' conversation."

"I don't want to see him; he's doubtless got something to sell."

"The other is stiff as a ramrod, and don't waste no words."

"He must have a bill. Tell them both I'm not at home."

Briggs—"I did not see you at church last Sunday." Braggs—"No; I didn't get in until you had gone to sleep.

"Always pay cash as you go. That's my principle," said Seedle. "Hump! That accounts for your slowness, I presume," remarked a friend.

Professor—"What is the difference between knowledge and conceit?" Student—"Knowledge is what we ourselves know; conceit is what the other fellows think they know."

Boy (at grindstone) Pap, have you read anything about the labor movement that they are agitating?

Old Man—Well, you git more labor movement in yer elbow and less in yer head. We'll git these axes done sooner.

Wife—My dear that horrid man next door has killed the dog.

Husband—Well, never mind, my dear; I'll get you another one some time.

Wife—But it wasn't my Fido that he killed; it was your hunting dog.

Husband (wildly)—Where's my gun?

Bob McGee's Scalp.

Robt. McGee, of Easton, Kan., is but thirty-nine years old, yet he has gone twenty-six years without a scalp, with a bullet in his ribs and the scars of several awful wounds by Indian arrows. It adds not a little to the interest of his case to learn that he was shot and scalped by the once noted Little Turtle, and the ball now lodged between two of his ribs was put there by Little Turtle, with the identical pistol which President Lincoln had not long before presented to the "noble red man."

Senator Plumb of Kansas, has introduced a bill in Congress to pay McGee $5,000 out of the general or Indian fund and presents in support of it abundant evidence to prove the following facts: In 1864 Robert McGee, thirteen years old, was left an orphan and without means, but being quite tall for his age he tried to enlist at Fort Leavenworth. He was rejected but employed as a teamster, and started with a small train to Fort Union, N. M. On the 11th of July, near where the city of Great Bend now stands, Little Turtle's band of Sioux warriors attacked the train. The whites fought long and well, but were overpowered, and every one killed except young McGee.

It seems that the Indians at first intended to spare him for some reason, but after compelling him to witness the torture of others not quite dead they decided to kill him also. The chief shot him with the elegant pistol he carried as a souvenir, and three spears were run into his back as he lay upon the ground. Little Turtle then tore off his scalp and struck him twice with a tomahawk, fracturing the skull at each blow. The savage departed, and in a few hours a party of soldiers arrived on their way to Fort Larned. Sorrowfully they gathered the corpses for burial but perceiving signs of life in McGee they bound up his wounds and took him to the fort.

The surgeons exhausted their skill upon him; the struggle was long and terrible, but he lived—as remarkable a recovery as any related in history. The details were laid before President Lincoln, who sent for the boy, and was deeply affected by his account. The Western generals were directed to favor him in employment. Many years after McGee's uncle acquired wealth in the West and tried to recover the scalp from Little Turtle, but unsuccessfully. McGee is now apparently in robust health, but of course terribly disfigured.

The Hour Hand.

"Come, come, you won't get around this week if you don't hurry up!" said the Minute Hand to the Hour Hand, and he winked at figure One as he [illegible] along. "Here come [illegible] Hour Hand," he said to figure Two. [illegible] he doesn't run over you [illegible] he cried, five minutes [illegible] "Why short [illegible] will be around after I've made about [illegible] more trips. Oh, he's [illegible]! Ah Four! Don't stop me for goodness' sake! [illegible] Hour Hand is after me."

And so the Minute Hand went round putting them up to poke fun at his slow friend. The figures laughed and called out to one another that the Minute Hand was too smart a chap for the Hour Hand to travel with. The Pendulum down below knew what was going on, and laughed softly as it rocked to and fro. Even the pale face of the clock seemed about to break out into a smile at the general hilarity.

Meanwhile the poor Hour Hand crept laboriously on.

"Ah, Shorty!" cried the Minute Hand close behind him, "been taking a nap? Come, I'll bet I can go around the ring twelve times to your once; look out now! I'll soon pass you."

The little bell struck sharply, "one, two!"

"Hello, he's got as far as Two!" The figures said, and they all laughed loudly.

"Oh, dear, dear!" sighed the Hand, "I can't go any faster to save my life. How I wish I was as smart as the Minute Hand. I'm the butt of all his jokes, and the others laugh at me, too. I haven't a friend on the face of the clock. I can't endure it any longer. I won't go on. I'll just stop right here."

"Where's our moderate friend?" asked the figure of the Minute Hand an hour or two later.

"O, he stopped back there," was the answer. "He started to race with me, but I guess he got out of wind."

After awhile the owner of the clock came into the room. "Hello!" said he "clock stopped? No," he continued, "but I might as well be for all the good I do without the Hour Hand." Then he gently touched the Hour Hand, seized the Minute Hand and shoved him round and round the circle, waited to see that they were going properly and went away.

"Whew!" exclaimed the Minute Hand, dizzy and breathless: "How he did shove me!" and he was mightily crestfallen because the figures had seen him so roughly used. But the Hour Hand traveled on with a happy face and the figures looked upon him with great respect.

The moral of this tale is that the smartest people are not always the most useful.

They Parted Forever.

"See that young lady," queried a young man on a ferryboat yesterday of his companion.

"Yes."

"I was engaged to her once."

"You don't say."

"See that poodle dog?"

"Yes."

"Well, he broke our engagement."

"No! What's the story?"

"It was on this very boat." We had come down for an evening ride. We sat right over there, and after a bit I got up to get her a drink of water. While I was gone her poodle got into my chair, and when I returned I sat down upon him."

"But if the girl really and truly loved you——"

"Oh, she did that."

"But——"

"But she loved the poodle more. I smashed him as flat as a sheet of fly-paper. She picked him up, squeezed him back into shape, and then said that we must part forever. We have been strangers since."

WASHINGTON LETTER.

[From our regular correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 1.—Senator Hoar is a remarkable product even for the republican party. He has done many absurd things in his life, but the climax was reached when in his advocacy of the Federal Election bill before the republican caucus he used the following language, which should drive him from public life for the rest of his natural life: "While I favor passing the tariff bill, sooner than that this Congress should not pass the Federal Election bill, I would prefer to see every manufacturing establishment in Massachusetts burned to ashes and the people of that State required to labor in callings in which they could not make more than 50 cents per day and that they be required to live on codfish." It is a great pity that this ranting demagogue could not be required to live on codfish and 50 cents per day.

The Senate now meets at 10 o'clock daily for the consideration of the tariff bill.

The Lodge bill still lies in a state of coma, in care of the committee on Privileges and Elections.

The Behring Sea troubles occupy a great deal of the time and attention of the House and Senate at present. Whether or not legislation will be enacted on the subject, this session, cannot be determined.

Senator Sherman has introduced a bill to incorporate the American National Association of The Red Cross, with Clara Barton, George Kennan, J. B. Hubbard, M. D. and others as its incorporators. After the passage of the bill, it will be unlawful for any other association to display the symbol of the Red Cross, in this country.

Senator Evarts has introduced a bill for the benefit of Dr. Mary Walker. It calls for $10,000. It is considered as a reimbursement to her for her services and sufferings as an assistant physician during the war. This bill for her relief has been reported favorbly by the House comittee on military affairs four times before.

The tariff question will not probably be settled for a month yet, Senator Morrill, of Vermont, is the prominent republican champion in the Senate, on this subject. But all his arguments seem to be delivered more for the purpose of displaying his talents than convincing any one of the sincerity of his remarks.

The Sundry civil bill is, also occupying the attention of the Senate. Mr. Cummings has just finished a severe attack on the Geological Survey. It was in respect to the irrigation of the Great American Desert. He ridiculed the work of the bureau in the preparation of topographical maps. These maps reminded him of a little incident. A Jerseyman merchant failed, and went into bankruptcy. While recounting his misfortunes to a friend he was approached by a peddler, and asked to buy a map of California. "Great Heavens" queried the bankrupt, "What does a man in my condition want of a map of California"? Should not the United States with a deficiency of $100,000,000 staring it in the face exclaim with the Jerseyman "Great Heavens! What do I want of a geological map, costing more than $15,000,000?"

There is a lot of fresh talk about Blaine's resigning, and the fact that Mr. Harrison has sent Mr. Blaine word to meet him at Cape May Point whither he has gone has caused many people to think that there is something in it. There is certainly the biggest kind of a family row among the republican leaders, and it would not be surprising if it resulted in somebody's resignation.

A family figure in Washington hotel lobbies will be removed when "Judge" W. G. Riley "an old Virginia gentlemen, by gad, sir" is confirmed by the Senate as Consul. to some place in Venezuela, to which he has been nominated. He is the original of the familiar "Judge" in the cartoon of the "Judge and the Major" and has always professed to be an authority on the duelling code. He was never known to refuse a drink, nor was he ever seen intoxicated, and it is thought that the administration made a mistake in not sending him to Mexico. If any American can stand "Pueque" he is the man.

Democratic Conventions.

At a meeting of the Democrats of Huntersville District, held in the Court house, on Saturday, July 26th, 1890.

On motion, L. M. McClintic was elected Chairman and James W. Warwick, Secretary.

On motion, it was decided to select delegates to the State, Congressional, Senatorial and Delegate District Conventions by election.

On motion, it was ordered that a copy of the proceedings of this meeting be furnished the POCAHONTAS TIMES, with request that they be published.

On motion the meeting adjourned sine die.

L. M. MCCLINTIC, Ch'n,
JAMES W. WARWICK, Jr., Sec'y.

Pursuant to a call of the District Executive Committee, the voters of Pocahontas county assembled at Academy, Saturday, July 26th, for the purpose of electing delegates to the State, Congressional and Senatorial conventions.

The meeting was called to order by Dr. C. W. Eskridge. On motion, Isaac McNeel was made chairman and E. I Holt, secretary, after which the following delegates were elected:

State convention—W. H. Overholt, E. I. Holt and R. W. Hill.

Congressional—E. I. Holt, G. S. McNeel and Dr. F. T. McClintic.

Senatorial—Dr. J. A. Larue, M. A. Dunlap and R. W. Hill.

Dr. F. T. McClintic, Dr. M. Wallace and G. E. Curry, were also appointed delegates to Huntersville to confer with delegates from Webster county, for the purpose of nominating a candidate to represent the delegate district, composed of Webster and Pocahontas counties, in the next Legislature.

Mr. R. K. Burns, a gentleman, who has affiliated in the past with the Republican party joined the meeting, came out squarely for Democracy, and was made an alternate to each of the above named conventions.

Resolutions endorsing the course of Hon. J. D. Alderson, the present encumbent from this Congressional District, commending him to the voters of said district and pledging him a hearty support for a renomination were passed.

Also resolutions heartily endorsing Capt. W. L. McNeel, as a candidate for the State Senate were passed.

On motion it was ordered that a copy of the proceedings of the meeting be sent to the Greenbrier Independent and POCAHONTAS TIMES for publication.

ISAAC MCNEEL, Ch'n,
E. I. HOLT, Sec'y.

In pursuance of a call by the Pocahontas county Executive committee, the Democrats of district No. 2, met at Edray, the 26th day of July, 1890. The meeting was called to order by Wm. M. Sharp. Levi Gay was made temporary chairman, and Chas. Cook temporary secretary.

On motion the temporary organization was made permanent.

On motion of J. Woods Price—J. C. Price, Wm. C. Aull, A. M. McGlaughlin, Q. M. Poage and Geo. W. McCollam, were appointed delegates to the Congressional convention, and were instructed to cast one and a-half (1½) votes for ex Gov. E. W. Wilson and one half (½) vote for Hon. John D. Alderson.

On motion of J. R. Apperson the same delegates were appointed to the Senatorial convention, and were instructed to cast their votes for Capt. Wm. L. McNeel for State Senator.

On motion, the same delegates were appointed to attend the State convention, and were instructed to cast their votes for D. B. Lucas for Supreme Court Judge.

On motion, Withrow McClintic, Philip Kramer, Wm. M Sharp, Jacob S. Moore and John W. Malcomb, were appointed delegates to the Delegate District Convention to be held at Huntersville on the — day of August, 1890.

On motion the Chairman and Secretary were added to each of the foregoing committees.

On motion, the proceedings of this meeting were ordered to be published in the POCAHONTAS TIMES and the Greenbrier Independent.

LEVI GAY, Ch'n,
CHAS. COOK, Sec'y.

Pursuant to a call of the County Executive Committee, the Democratic voters of Green Bank district assembled at Green Bank, on the 26th inst.

G. W. Siple called the house to order and explained the object of the meeting.

On motion, H. A. Yeager was elected chairman and J. P. Wooddell, secretary.

G. W. Siple moved that the delegates to the several conventions be selected by ballot, and that each delegate be voted for separately which was unanimously adopted.

The meeting then proceeded to the election of the following delegates to the several conventions.

District Delegate convention—J. W. Riley, J. C. Arbogast and J. C. Lakin. Alternates—J. L. Hudson, W. H. Collins and Hugh McGlaughlin.

Senatorial convention—Dr. C. L. Austin, C. O. Arbogast and C. A. Lightner. Alternates—J. A. Taylor, J. W. Riley and W. W. Arbogast.

Congressional convention—J. C. Arbogast, H. A. Yeager and B. F. McElwee. Alternates—Geo. D. Oliver, B. F. E. Wooddell and J. C. Lakin.

State convention—C. B. Swecker, S. B Hannah and B. M. Yeager.

S. B Hannah offered the following resolution which was adopted.

Be it resolved. That it is the desire of this meeting that in the Delegate district convention, each district should have representation in proportion to the democratic vote polled at the last Presidential election, and, and that our delegates to said convention be instructed to claim their votes upon said basis.

On motion, the secretary was requested to furnish proceedings to the ED. of TIMES with request that he publish same.

H. A. YEAGER, Ch'n,
J. P. WOODDELL, Sec'y.

I hereby announce myself as a candidate to represent this District in the next State Senate, subject to the action of the Democratic Convention to be held at Hinton on the 27th day of August, 1890. Respectfully,
J. P. MOOMAU.

To The Voters of Pocahontas County.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the office of Clerk of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County, at the election to be held November 4th next, and if elected I promise to discharge the duties thereof to the best of my ability.

Very Respectfully,
J. H. PATTERSON.

To the Voters of Pocahontas County

Gentlemen and fellow citizens and to the voters of Pocahontas and Webster counties: at the request of many friends in this county I hereby announce myself a Candidate for the House of Delegates for Pocahontas and Webster counties, and should I get the nomination and be elected I shall work to better the condition of our people and the counties, and asking your support, &c. Truly Thine,
C. B. SWECKER.

HOME NEWS

—Quite a refreshing rain Tuesday evening.

—I. B. Moore, of Knapp's creek, was in town Tuesday.

—Mess. E. I. Holt, of Academy and Fred Wallace, of Mill Point, were in the City Tuesday.

—Attorney C. F. Moore, attended Court at Addison, Webster county, last week.

—Rev. L. F. Snapp will preach at Mt. Pleasant next Sunday at 11 a. m. and Huntersville 4 p. m.

—Attorney L. M. McClintic spent the first of this week fishing on Williams river.

—Ammonia is the best suggested remedy for bee stings, as it neutralizes the acid injected by the sting.

—The St. Lawrence Boom & M'f'g Co. are making arrangements to build a lumber camp a short way above town. They will cut the Huggett timber this fall and winter.

—Isaac Wolf, living on Potts creek, Alleghany county, Va., was killed by an officer while resisting arrest last week.

—Typhoid fever broke out some time ago at Elkins, Randolph county, and since that time, we have been reliably informed, persons are dying almost daily.

—The Editor has been suffering for the past three weeks from rheumatism. THE TIMES will not appear next week, on account of his illness.

—Attorney H. S. Rucker and family and Sam. Scott, Esq., left this morning (Wednesday) for an extended visit to relatives at Lewisburg and near Lynchburg, Va.

—We are very sorry to learn that Mr. H. M. Lockridge, who was very low with rheumatism for several months last winter, is again suffering from the same affliction.

—On the first page will be found the questions given at the teachers' examination at this place Monday and Tuesday of last week, also the names of the teachers, their grades and per cent.

WANTED—A good white, study girl to cook, wash and iron. Wages, $8.00 per month, with good fire and bed. Address F. P. Staley, Ronceverte, W. Va.

—Baldness is catching says a scientist. It's catching flies in summer time. Use Hall's Hair Renewer and cover the bald place with healthy hair and flies won't trouble.

—That distention of the stomach which many people feel after eating, may be due to improper mastication of the food; but, in most cases, it indicates a weakness of the digestive organs, the best remedy for which is one of Ayer's Pills, to be taken after dinner.

—The road advertised in THE TIMES, to and from where the bridge is to be rebuilt, through Mr. Wm. Curry's and Mrs. Betsy McGlaughlin's farms was let to Harry Thompson, Esq., of Mill Point, for the sum of $338.50. We understand he will begin work on it the first of next week.

—This has been a poor fruit year all along and now we are told that apples—the great stand-by of the good housekeeper to add relish to lunches, desserts, and suppers—are going to be very scarce and dear. The threatened scarcity of peaches is bad enough, but apples—how are we going to live without them!

—The Baltimore American relates that a couple from this county, who went to Cumberland, Md., to be married, were delayed thirty-six hours in having the ceremony performed, because the groom was not old enough by that number of hours to get a license.

—We cordially advance our congratulations to Prof. C. A. Brown, Principal of Hillsboro Academy and Miss Lillie Overholt. We understand that this (Wednesday) is the happy evening when "they twain" will be made "one," passing into the blest state of matrimony.

—The vicissitudes of climate are trying to most constitutions, especially to people having impure blood. For all such (and they constitute the majority), the best safeguard is Ayer's Sarsaparilla, the use of which cleanses the blood and strengthens and invigorates the system.

—Rev. S. G. Ferguson, Presiding Elder Lewisburg District, M. E. Church south, preached two excellent sermons at Sunset, on Sunday and Monday. He also favored Huntersville congregation Monday evening. He is a man of considerable prepossession and pulpit power. His preaching is clear-cut, definite and practical; and his style is peculiar to himself.

CHINESE MEDICAL PRACTICE.—In China a physician attends only to the inner man, and the surgeon to the outer. And the Chicago Tribune tells this story to show how strictly the code of medical ethics is observed in that country: "An English tourist was riding a bycicle in Hong Kong when he fell from his bycicle with such violence that one of the iron spokes was run into his shoulder, where it broke off and stuck fast. The man was removed to a house and a surgeon summoned. The surgeon first demanded his fee. After pocketing his money he broke off the protruding point of the spoke, leaving the other fragment imbedded in the sufferers body. He then went away. The tourist was in intense agony, but the surgeon would not help him. Medical etiquette forbade. "The case is for the physician," he said, "as the wire is inside the body."

The Snake Charmer.

Lulu La Toska is the name of the snake charmer who handles the reptiles at Barnum's show. She is a Russian by birth, and has had control over snakes from her babyhood.

"How do you account for your power over snakes?" was asked by a Chicago Globe reporter at the close of a performance in which she had hung 450 pounds of live coils around her neck and body.

"It is a charm I have possessed since my birth. I was born to govern them, and the mark of a snake encircles me. Since two years old I have played with them. They have bitten me twice, but I am still alive, as you see."

"Where do you get the snakes?"

"They come from India. I am going to get thirty new ones in a few days. I lost one of the old ones I had had for fourteen years, in St. Louis. The stage fell on him and crushed him to death. Another one tried to bite me, and struck herself. She was deadly poison and died. They cost lots of money, from $150 to $600, and it's a big misfortune to have one die."

"How often do they eat?"

"Every three weeks usually, but the mean one that bit itself to death had not fasted anything for a year and a half. Did you notice me tickle one of them under the chin? That's Emma. She likes it too, and just lays her head back to enjoy it. She eats two chickens every week now. They are cross and don't eat when they are blind, which they are every six weeks. Then I have to touch them lightly so they will know when I am coming. If they turn their heads to look at me I pick them up, but if they stretch their heads away I let them alone, for they are ugly. We have to humor them like children."

"Is their bite poisonous?" asked the reporter.

"Yes; I handle an Indian bwarpythod, one of the most poisonous snakes in the world. I also play with the black natter without any trouble."

London.

It had 4,788,657 inhabitants at the last census. It has now over 5,000,000.

Of its adult population, according to census returns, more than one third were born in the country.

A birth takes place on an average every three minutes.

A death takes place on an average of every five minutes.

About 247 persons every day are added to its population, or 1,729 every week.

Last year 86 miles 384 yards of houses were added to its streets.

It contains upwards of a million of habitual neglecters of public worship.

It has 60 miles of shops open every Sunday.

It has a foreign population roughly estimated at 271,000.

There are 11,128 public houses.

"Josiah," said Mrs. Chugwater to the head of the family, "I believe our Johnny is turning over a new leaf and is going to be a better boy. He asked me a little while ago if he could take the family Bible up to his room for an hour or two."

About the same time a boy of Johnny's size was seen to enter a cigarstore in the vicinity open a big book and lay it on the counter.

"Do you see this entry!" he demanded, addressing the proprietor in thunder tones. "You said I wasnt sixteen. Look at this: 'John, born May 5, 1874.' Gimme five boxes of cigarettes, and be quick about it. Blame yer gizzard!"

A PATCHWORK QUILT.

BY MARY KYLE DALLAS.

Have you anywhere about your house, amidst your counterpanes and comfortables which you looked at five minutes before buying, perhaps, one of those old-fashioned patchwork quilts made of the tiniest pieces, arranged in the most intricate patterns, over which at least one pair of eyes were strained for days and weeks before quilting time came, and all those puffy little diamonds were marked out, amidst chat and laughter, by half-a-dozen ladies? Did you ever, in childhood, sit upon the bed and hear the history of the various pieces of chintz?

That's a piece of your first colored dress; that I had when I was a girl; that was your grandmother's morning-gown; that is a piece Miss S—— gave me. I have heard such a history many a time, and little pictures used to pass before my eyes with the words. I could see just how grandma looked in the morning-gown. I could see myself a baby, taking toddling steps in the blue frock. It seemed so funny to have been a baby—when I was an important person of five years. It doesn't seem half so funny now, for I have begun to doubt whether I shall ever be anything else, and to know just how many big babies there are in this world.

Dear old patchwork quilts! We've lost something in losing them, I think, and probably Mrs. Mumford thought so, too, for whenever any of her children were found sitting with those idle hands, for which Dr. Watts declares that Satan always finds some mischief, she invariably remarked: "You'd better get your patchwork."

They always obeyed, those three little girls, Lucy, Ruth and Olive, and there were piles of quilts in the upstairs room where spare bedding was stored—quilts of many colors, quilts of only two, quilts with large, square blocks, and quilts with intricate patterns, like a Chinese puzzle, quilts that had been made by people in their nineties, and quilts that had been made by people who could not yet say: "I am nine years old." Piecing a quilt was the first work and the last of the members of the Mumford family. I think an ancestor made some patchwork on board of the Mayflower. At least, it was said so.

When a young person married, a dowry of quilts had always been provided—always would be while Mrs. Mumford lived. When Olive was fifteen she had been told that the white and Turkey red quilt which her great-grandmother had made was to be among her share, as the oldest daughter of the house. She laughed then, and said:

"I shall always stay at home with you, mamma; I shall be the old maid daughter."

A year afterward she did not think this, whatever she might have said, for the year had made her feel that she was no longer a child, and she had met Harry Martin, who had put an engagement ring on Olive's finger, and, if all went well, her seventeenth birthday would find her a mother.

Nothing like seeing your children settled before you are broken down yourself," said the mother; and [illegible] began to teach Olive the the higher mysteries of pastry. [illegible] making every girl of that family quite understood.

A lover always takes great interest in his lady's handiwork. Harry [illegible] all the little pieces of sewing which passed through Olive's hands with immense admiration, and the homely patchwork was just as fine in his eyes as anything else; and there was often much talk about the pieces, and, once or twice, he had cut them out, after the card board patterns, loving to meddle with anything, that she was busy with, in old true lover's fashion.

One evening, when he went in, he found the girl looking, as an artist might look at a rare old master, at a long breadth of old-fashioned, flowered chintz.

"Mother has just given me this, Harry," she said. "It is like a gown of old Aunt Hepsiba's. It shimmers like silk, and see how fine it is. But fancy wearing such large patterns. Look! a butterfly on a bough, and a rose, and a butterfly on a bough again, and then another rose, like wall paper. The difficulty will be," said Olive, pausing to consider, "how to get the pattern into a patch without spoiling it."

"I'll help you," said Harry; and to work he went, and for a pleasant hour or two he kept cutting patches. A bud and a butterfly on one a rose on the other, bud and butterfly, and rose again.

"And he has not spoiled one, mamma," said Olive, in a tone of pride. "I'm sure I should have cut a dozen butterflies' heads off, if I had tried."

So the young things laughed over their exploits, and then slipped merrily away to have their lovers' chat where nobody could listen.

It was the last. The next day Harry Martin was missing, and with him a large sum of money from his employers' safe. The news spread through the country town like wild fire. Harry was an orphan, and the son of an old friend of the head of the firm. It was understood that they would be merciful, but his character was blighted forever.

No one doubted his guilt but Olive. She steadfastly declared him innocent.

Weeks passed on, and then was no news of him—at least, none that reached the Mumford's ears; but one night, when Mrs. Mumford went out to the cow house to see that Crummie was safe for the night, some one came out of the darkness, and called her.

"Who is that?" cried the lady, her heart giving one great throb.

"It's I—Harry," said a well known voice. "Oh! Mrs. Mumford, let me see Olive."

"Harry Martin!" said Mrs. Mumford. "Oh! Harry Martin, you've made a sad house of mine!" And she broke into tears.

"And you all believed it at once!" said Harry, sadly. "I didn't think you would."

"Oh, Harry," said Mrs. Mumford, "Satan tempts us all. I'm sorry for you, but you can't see Olive. It's better for her. You shouldn't. She was very fond of you, Harry."

"And she has turned against me, too, then?" said the young man.

You don't blame her, poor lamb," said Mrs. Mumford. "A girl like that can't have anything to do with one that has disgraced himself."

"Love is more steadfast," said Harry. "Evil reports would not have won me from Olive."

Then, without another word, he went away—and such a hold have homely things upon our memory sometimes, that, as he went, he saw the pretty household picture he had last seen beneath the roof that now refused to welcome him, as plainly as we see things in dreams; his love with her dark curls about her face and the needle in her hands, and the skein of thread about her neck; a bright lamp burning upon the table, and on the other side, himself cutting out pieces for patchwork from a pasteboard pattern, and laying in a little brilliant pile, squares and triangles, on which were a rose and a butterfly upon a flowering branch, a butterfly on a flowering branch, and a full blown rose alternately.

A Western editor speaks of a wind that "just sat up on its hind legs and howled." Such a wind it must have been that was howling through the bleak Maine country twenty years from the night on which Harry Martin turned from the Mumfords' door and went his way alone.

The inn or tavern or hotel, which ever it was, which bore the name of T. Jolliver upon its signboard, was not expecting any guests that night, but, nevertheless, one came to its doors—came late, too, as the clocks were striking ten, and people generally thinking of bed.

The guest was a man of forty, with a sad sort of face—a face with a story in it. But he was well dressed, and evidently no poor traveler. He had supper in the best parlor, and, meanwhile, a fire was made in the best bedroom, in which, when he made his way thither, he found a buxom, youngish woman spreading an extra counterpane up on the bed.

"Good evening, sir," she said, turning toward him with a manner that bespoke the landlady. "I thought I'd see that you were comfortable myself. I never leave everything to chambermaids. When I married a hotel-keeper, I made up my mind to help him, and there's no such way of making guests feel discouraged as turning them over to help. And I've given you my prettiest quilt, too," said she, with a laugh. "There's an honor."

The gentleman looked toward the bed. The quilt was patchwork. It had a wide striped border, but in the center the blocks were all the same—bright chintz alternated with white—a butterfly on a branch, a rose, a butterfly on a branch, and a rose again.

The man took a fold of it up in his hand, and looked at it as men do not often look at patchwork quilts. The woman babbled on.

"We're great for patchwork in our family. Such a pile as we had of these quilts at home. Sister Ruth had twenty when she was married, but I had fifty. My other sister gave me her share, seeing that I married a hotel-keeper, and she thinks she'll never marry. Oh, dear! There's a story in a good many quilts, if you but knew it; and there is a story in this. It's the last one Olive ever made. But I'm boring you, sir."

"No, go on," said the gentleman. "Go on, please."

"She was engaged," said the landlady, "and she was sixteen. One afternoon, she and her sweetheart cut out those [illegible] the next they parted. He was accused of a crime—of robbery, I should say it—and she never saw him again. She knew [illegible] was innocent. She said [illegible] gels in heaven [illegible] doubt it, but [illegible] with her until a [illegible] and then an old [illegible] who was friends [illegible] ing caught in [illegible] my sister's [illegible] sweetheart [illegible] The story he [illegible] ployers of being knocked down in the streets of New York, where he went that holiday afternoon, and being thought drunk, and put into a station house, and being ashamed to give his name next morning, and too sick to come home next day, was doubt true. His employers advertised for him, but in vain. And mother owned to sending him away from the door when he came to see Olive. It is a sad story. Olive can't seem to like any one else, and the poor fellow was so fond of her. So that's the story of the quilt."

The woman stopped and gave a little cry, for the guest had flung himself upon his knees, and was kissing that patchwork quilt as lovers kiss their sweetheart's lips.

She gave another little cry in a moment, and knelt down beside him, and put her hand upon his shoulder.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" she sobbed, crying hard herself. "Oh, dear! I do believe it is Harry Martin."

And it was Harry Martin, who had been to the far ends of the earth and had found gold, but not happiness, believing himself robbed forever of love and of fair repute, and who had returned to find both awaiting him, through the means of that patchwork quilt, with its butterflies and flowering boughs and roses.

"Lucy," said Olive to her sister, a few months afterward, "now that we are going to housekeeping, I want you to give me one thing."

"Anything on earth that I can," said Mrs. Jolliver. "I was thinking of a silver service."

"Oh, Lucy, dear," said Olive, beginning to cry for very happiness, "it's only the butterfly quilt that I want. The dear old quilt. Harry says we can't keep house without it, we both love it so."

"I've rolled it up for you already," said Mrs. Jolliver. "It seems to belong to you, Olive."

And so to-day Olive's last baby sits upon the brilliant quilt, and tries, with his chubby fingers, to pull the [illegible] butterflies and roses.

THE 31 [illegible]

The two men [illegible] had been sitting together in the [illegible] near the door of the car became engaged in an animated controversy, and their loud voices attracted the attention of all the other passengers. Finally one of them rose up and said.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I appeal to you to decide a disputed point. My friend here insists that not more than three persons out of five believe they have souls. I take a more cheerful view of humanity than that. Will all of you who believe you have souls raise your right hands?

Every right hand in the car went up.

"Thank you," he said, with a smile. "Keep them up just a moment. Now, will all of you who believe in a hereafter please raise your left hand also?"

Every left hand in the car went up.

"Thank you, again," he said. "Now, while all of you have your hands raised," he continued, drawing a pair of revolvers, and leveling them, "my friend here will go down the aisle and relieve you of whatever valuables you may happen to have. Lively, now, Jim."

The cholera is spreading throughout Egypt and 155 deaths are reported in one day. There are grave fears that the scourge will be carried into Europe by fleeing pilgrims.

In the city of New York women who are wives and mothers work in shops for thirty cents per day, and girls between thirteen and seventeen years of age work on articles for as low as five cents per day.

An effort is being made in Richmond, Va., to raise a gurantee fund of $10,000 in order to secure a state fair this fall. So far about $5,000 has been subscribed.

Abra[illegible] [illegible] clerk of the court [illegible] of Tucker county, who died [illegible] a few days ago, was born without legs over fifty years ago. He took a prominent part in political and civil life and during the war, served in the Confederate cavalry, attended to his horse and required no assistance in mounting, having no superior as an active soldier. He was elected clerk and served seven years.

The sales of leaf tobacco in Danville, Va., for July was 1,472,700 pounds, only about half the amount sold in July of last year. The sales for the first ten months of the fiscal year were 22,800,000 pounds, near 3,000,000 less than during the same period last year. Stock is very scarce. It is believed that the sales for this tobacco year will not exceed 35,000,000 pounds.

The 22nd of August will be a red letter day with the Farmers' Alliance Cooperative Manufacturing Co., at Iron Gate. At that date they expect to complete and put in operation their extensive shops, and there is to be a grand excursion on the occasion, favorable rates having been gotten from all the railroad companies. It will be an interesting occasion. Hundreds will be there.

Mrs. J. Every day wives who had better be divorced are murdered and every moment of time some women is abused and driven toward death and humiliation by drunken, beastly husbands. And yet girls give themselves away to almost any one who asks them.—Ex.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for any case it fails to cure. WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our regular correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 8.—Mr. Harrison will to-morrow leave for Boston where he hopes to make himself solid with the G. A. R., at its annual encampment. But perhaps a gentleman named Alger may have something to say about that. Several mem[illegible] of the Cabinet will go along to help their chief.

The River and Harbor bill, by previous agreement, displaced the Tariff bill in the Senate to-day.

Speaker Reed will have many things to account for in the general day of reckoning, which comes to all men; but if he persists in his efforts to prevent an appropriation being made to erect a new Government printing office, and an accident occurs, and it is liable any time, in the present death trap resulting in the loss of many precious lives, that will be the most terrible of all. The old building now used has been pronounced dangerous to health and life by every competent architect who has examined it, and there have been a number of them its [illegible] settle as much as three inches [illegible] heavily loaded, as they are al[illegible] constantly; its walls have [illegible]cks in them big enough to put [illegible] balls into, and the whole structure shakes and shivers at every [illegible] of the machinery, and more than 2,000 men and women engaged in working for this [illegible] and wealthy Government [illegible] to take their lives in [illegible] by working daily in this [illegible]. The Senate passed an [illegible] to an appropriation bill [illegible] for a new building; but [illegible] of Speaker Reed the [illegible] to concur.

[illegible] of most interest between house of Congress at [illegible] of Rules, for the government [illegible] that body.

[illegible] of Mr. Breckinridge to [illegible] caused quite a [illegible] the House, not only for what [illegible], but by his ability to attract ones attention. He said that friction between the Speaker and the members of the House had been predicted when the new code of Rules was adopted. He was not now surprised when the Speaker's partiality was called in question. But the true judgment of the country would be, that however well the Rules might produce political legislation, they had failed as to that great domain of legislation which lay outside of the fierce contest of party. They might carry through a jug-handled Tariff bill, but they did not carry through the general appropriation bills, necessary for the sustenance of the government. The majority, under these Rules, might put upon the statute books a force bill, iniquitous in its provisions and infamous in its object; but it could not obtain the commendation of the people for its action on the general legislation of the government. The force bill could not escape the fierce criticism of the people; for on account of the absence of discussion of all matters of general importance in Congress there was necessity for discussion elsewhere in the press, at the fireside and the assemblages of the people. Of the bills which had passed under the Rules of the House few had become laws, and few of those which had, would, in his opinion, remain long upon the statute books.

There was great laughter in the House when he contracted the difference of the rulings by Speaker Reed and those of Mr. Carlisle and Randall.

He said that he had no criticism to make upon the Speaker. If the gentlemen, on the other side were satisfied with that officer "Heaven forbid" that he should remove that satisfaction. If they were willing to accept the Speaker as a fair type of their party he would enter no dissent. The Speaker had won his supremacy. He had exercised that supremacy. He had been the republican leader on the floor. The republicans had made him their leader in the chair, and he had exercised that leader-ship.

Mr. Peters, also protested against disturbing old issues and bringing, and creating a state of irritation in that deliberative body. Amongst other things this republican Representative said: "Why stir up these ammosities! Why bring up these unpleasant questions that divide parties and separate the north from the south?" (as if the democrats did it.) He was followed by Mr. Boutelle, in an effort to fawn like a hound before the speaker, and pretend to defend him, but every thing he said was too sickly, too be-scattered, too tiresome to write about, and was even too weakly delivered to listen to.

It is said that the Star-eyed Goddess looks seventeen years younger than she did before Secretary Blaine wrote his reciprocity letter.

Mr. McKinley's heart is swollen and sore, and his epiglottis sinks known with a pop, when he sees Mr. Blaine coming. The handwriting is on the wall in Kansas, in letters six yards high, and not higher than they are thick, and it has been observed by Senator Plumb after the people of that State took him by the nose and turned his eyes to the direction of the awful inscription.

AN AWFUL AFFAIR.

The First Execution by Electricity Was Not a Success—Kemmler Was Burned to Death.

The trial of a new means for taking human life at Auburn, N. Y. Wednesday morning, while prompted by humane motives, has resulted in a sickening spectacle presented by a poisoned wretch at whose vital center was kept pounding for some moments an alternating current of electricity which, though it ultimately destroyed his life, subjected the criminal to a torture of which no living being has knowledge, and which none can describe. Imperfect registry of the current's pressure or faulty contact of the electrodes prevented instantaneous death. The layman may gain some conception of the process of this killing when the statement is made that a person whose body should be shaken into fragments could not have suffered such pain as did Wm. Kemmler, whose nerve cells and tissues were disintegrated not in a flash, as designed, but by the relatively slow strokes of the electric hammers upon them. Whether the blood yet retains its normal consistency or whether it is partially or wholly fluidized by divorce of oxygen from the blood corpuscles can only be determined by the autopsy which was about to be commenced. Kemmler's nerve was something wonderful. He never faltered. He directed the adjustment of himself in the chair and counseled the warden to moderation, to secure perfect safety. The shock was given at 6:43½ and was continued about eighteen seconds. Two minutes after the current was cut off there was evidence of respiration. As soon as possible the current was returned, then cut off, again and again respiration was evident after a few minutes. Saliva came fr[illegible] the mouth, the chest heaved the[illegible] was a wheezing in the throat. Th[illegible] shock was again put to the prisoner, who, the doctors remarked, was unconscious from the moment of the first shock. After a short time smoke appeared at the back. The flesh was burning. The spectacle was most trying. The man, the doctors said, suffered no pain, however. The warden says the voltage at first shock was at 1,800 volts, which run down to a point not named. After the third contact o[illegible] four minutes the man was declared dead. The warden's certificate o[illegible] death was signed by all presen[illegible] and the party broke up at 7:30 t[illegible] meet at 8:15, when the body would be ready for the autopsy. When the mask was taken off Kemmler's face, his eyes were found half open and his expression, while not normal or placid, was not horrifying to see.

Coughing,

Is Nature's effort to expel foreign substances from the bronchial passages. Frequently, this causes inflammation and the need of an anodyne. No other expectorant or anodyne is equal to Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. It assists Nature in ejecting the mucus, allays irritation, induces repose, and is the most popular of all cough cures.

"Of the many preparations before the public for the cure of colds, coughs, bronchitis, and kindred diseases, there is none, within the range of my experience, so reliable as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. For years I was subject to colds, followed by terrible coughs. About four years ago, when so afflicted, I was advised to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral and to lay all other remedies aside. I did so, and within a week was well of my cold and cough. Since then I have always kept this preparation in the house, and feel comparatively secure."—Mrs. L. L. Brown, Denmark, Miss.

"A few years ago I took a severe cold which affected my lungs. I had a terrible cough, and passed night after night without sleep. The doctors gave me up. I tried Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which relieved my lungs, induced sleep, and afforded the rest necessary for the recovery of my strength. By the continual use of the Pectoral, a permanent cure was effected."—Horace Fairbrother, Rockingham, Vt.

HOME NEWS

—Several drummers in town today.

—Mr. Jas. W. Warwick, is visiting some of the booming towns in Va.

—Mr. H. M. Lockridge, who has been suffering from rheumatism for several days, is better.

—Attorney L. M. McClintic was down at the Levels the first of this week on business.

—Attorney C. F. Moore and wife have been visiting relatives at Dunmore for a few days past.

—Mess. J. and [illegible] of Lewisburg, and [illegible] of Lexington, Va., are guests at Huntersville Hotel.

—There are now about 1,200 guests at the Greenbrier White Sulphur, and yet the height of the season has not been reached.

—Rev. L. F. Swapp, started this morning (Wednesday) for the Beverly Ridge camp meeting.

—The Bellevue District Fair, to be held in Staunton, Va., will commence September 25th and continue four days.

—Mess. Jno. Clark, and Harry Thompson have commenced the new road to and from where the bridge is to be rebuilt.

—Mr. Henry Dansonville, the contractor to build the abutments for the bridge near this place, has come, with a force of hands, ready to commence work.

—Look out! watch your chicken houses. There is a chicken thief around. Mr. S. L. Brown's chicken house has been visited three times and three carried away each time, in the last few nights.

—Salt sprinkled on any substance burning on a stove will stop the smoke and smell. Salt thrown upon coals blazing from the fat of chops or ham will cause the blaze to subside.

—We announced last week that there wouldn't be any paper issued from this office this week owing to our rheumatic affliction, but since, have gotten better and THE TIMES appears "on time."

—Much injury is done by the use of irritating, griping compounds taken as purgatives. In Ayer's Pills, the patient has a mild but effective cathartic, that can be confidently recommended alike for the most delicate patients as well as the most robust.

—There will be a meeting of the Huntersville Farmers' Alliance at the Court house, Saturday, August 23rd, at 2 o'clock p. m., at which time it will be necessary for all members to be present, as there is important business to be transacted. By order of the president.

—No medicine in the world is in better repute or more widely known than Ayer's Sarsaparilla. As a safe and certain remedy for all manner of blood disorders, leading physicians and druggists everywhere recommend it in preference to any other.

—Twelve street cars, made by the St. Louis car company, passed through here this week for service in Staunton. They were beauties. The "city of the hills" is coming! She needs, and must have, a daily paper, and that soon. It has long been a wonder to us that she has delayed thus long in this matter.—Clifton Forge and Iron Gate Review.

—A new dog law in Wisconsin declares that if any dog shall attack or run out and bark at any person or horse attached to a carriage traveling in a highway, complaint may be made to a justice of the peace, who on proof that the charge is true shall order the owner or possessor of such dog to kill him immediately. Such should be a law in W. Va.

—The Greenbrier County Primary election was held Saturday, August 2nd. Result: R. D. Erwin and Jas. F. Clark, for House of Delegates; S. H. Nickell, for County Commissioner; Jonathan Mayse for Clerk Circuit Court and Charles B. Beeler for Clerk County Court. G. W. Wilson received a small majority for Congress. Capt. W. L. McNeel received 1,333 votes and J. P. Moomau received 111 votes for States Senate. Greenbrier being entitled to 21 votes in the Congressional Convention at Hinton on the 26th inst, will be cast as follows: E. W. Wilson 11 votes and J. D. Alderson 10 for Congress. B. B. [illegible], will receive 21 votes for Court of Appeals. In the Senatorial Convention, Wm. L. McNeel will receive 19½ votes and J. P. Moomau 1½ votes.

—WANTED—A good white, steady girl to cook, wash and iron. Wages, $8.00 per month, with good fare and bed. Address F. P. Staley, Ronceverte, W. Va.

—[illegible] county is to have a legal hanging. [illegible] Martin will be hanged on the 3rd of October next, provided there is no hitch in carrying out the mandate of the court.

Wayside Notes.

During an interesting excursion the last days of July, it was the writer's pleasure to visit the Laurel Run settlement, nine or ten miles north of Marlinton. Messrs. Geo. White, Shearer, McClure, Taylor, Childers, Dilley and others are building up nice homes, and it looks as if this would be one of the prosperous sections of our grand county in a few years.

Those living here are the first to hear the booming of dynamite, announcing the advent of a railroad, the R R's [illegible] excursions to hear the miners setting off their blasts, as your correspondent was informed.

Capt. Peters and Col. Clay are operating an excellent steam saw mill on the lands of Adam McNeel, Esq. The crew consisting of Auburn Friel, Adam Young, Barnes and Kirkpatrick, seem to be one the best, capable and willing. It is marvellous to see how soon an immense tree can be changed into commercial lumber when manipulated by these stalwart young men. The mill is located a few rods from the famous centennial cherry tree, whence Col. Clay procurred the block that attracted so much attention at the Philadelphia exposition in 1876, and prepared the way for bringing the Pocahontas lumber into such prominent notice.

The remains of this historic tree were pointed out to the writer by his kind and obliging friend Mr. Geo. White.

The number, coolness and excellence of the springs found in this region, is phenomenal and some day this will be a health resort. There is something in the atmosphere that makes it specially pleasant and invigorating to inhale, owing possibly to the presence of these springs and the dense forest of pine and cherry and birch.

Some pleasant hours were spent in the former home of the late Capt. Wm. Cochran near the head of Stoney creek.

The writer's feelings were deeply touched by a view of the neatly cared for grave, where the Captain rests from his busy life of seventy years or more. He was a cheerful jovial man, and always had a kind word for his young friend "Billy" and hoped he would try to make a good man of himself.

His noble form would quiver with emotion as he recalled the years he had lived in sin; but afterwards his eye would beam with rapture, when speaking of the Redeemer, that sought him when a stranger.

Perhaps no one in this region ever repeated with more unction or more frequently these words than the writers kindly cherished friend, Capt. Wm. Cochran:

Jesus sought me when a stranger,
Wandering from the fold of God;
He to rescue me from danger,
Interposed his precious blood.

Not a Beggar.

"Gentlemen," he began, in a [illegible] voice, "I'm dead broke, but no beggar. I want to raise about ten shillings, but I shall do it in a legitimate manner. Now, then, let me ask you to inspect this."

He took from his pocket a piece of iron chain, as large as his thumb, and containing six links. He passed it round and, after it had been carefully inspected by each of the party, he continued:

"I want to bet my overcoat, which is worth two pounds, against ten shillings in cash, that none of you can separate one link from the others."

The piece of chain was passed round again to be more closely scrutinized, and finally one of the party, who was a machinist, returned it with the remark,—

"And I want to stake that sum against your overcoat that you can't do it yourself."

"Done!" said the stranger, as he pulled off his coat.

Coat and cash were put in the hands of a stake-holder, and the stranger asked the group to follow him. He walked across the street and into a blacksmith's shop, and, picking up a hammer and chisel, he deliberately cut a link.

The onlookers stood like so many bumpkins at a country fair, but when the stranger held up the link and claimed the stakes, the machinist recovered his wits sufficiently to exclaim,—

"Sold by a professional swindler! The money is yours; but in exactly thirty seconds after you receive it I shall begin to kick and you had better be twenty yards off."

"Thanks—glad to have met you—good-day," replied the stranger, and he was out of sight in seven seconds.

Oklahoma Courtship.

Buckskin Pete—Sal, I've seen yer for about three days now, an' I likes yer real well. What der yer say, let's dubble up an' get spliced; an' we'll start er ranch on our own hook?

Sal (the belle of Dead Man's creek)—I don't know, Pete. I likes yer purty well; but I can't say as I'm ded stuck on yer. Look hyar, what's that story I heern 'bout you runnin' 'way from a tenderfoot 'cause he had a shooter?

Pete—'Tain't so, Sal. I killed the varmint plumb ded.

Sal—Good! Got some style, ain't ye? But then I hears you played poker with Bill Santers and let him cheat without poppin' him off. What's the matter? he too much for yer? 'F he is, he's the one I wants.

Pete—Couldn't help that, Sally dear. Bill he got the drop on me and kicked me outer the game.

Sal—All right. 'Nother thing. 'D you ever steal any horses?

Pete—Yep. Four, six months ago, while old Sam Wolf was over ter Kansas.

Sal—Git ketched?

Pete—Nope; wouldn't be here now 'f I had.

Sal—Good boy. You're a dandy. Only one thing more, Pety. Jane Rawlins says you drink that 'Pollinaris water, what the tenderfeets from the East drink. That so?

Pete—'Ts a lie. I drink plain whiskey.

Sal—All right. I don't want no man what kan't take a drink 'o whiskey now an' then, so I want you to understand that.

Pete—Is it a go, Sal?

Sal—Well, I don't know as I've got eny more objections, 'cept that you ought ter wait some night fer Bill Santers an' pick him off. Howsomever, I'm yours, Pety, old man. So come kiss your little wifey; an' then go out and ask the old man while he sez. If he don't agree, we'll cut out afore he comes home and skip down to the settlement and have the parson do the thing up squar. Whoop la! Go 'long now, Jim, you soft fool, you.

ELOISE.

How the Cruel Flood Revealed to Her True Love.

They had parted coldly.

Richard Holmes had walked rapidly up the street to his boarding place with a white face, sternly set lips, his hands clasped tightly behind him, and his whole frame quivering with wounded pride and keen disappointment.

Eloise Ellison had turned her pretty face homeward with a proud little toss, and a look of something like triumph in her coquettish dark eyes.

That she was a spoiled and petted beauty, every one in the village knew; and that she was as willful and capricious and exacting, as she was bright and pretty and bewitching, every one knew as well. The only child of the wealthy mill-owner, from her very infancy indulged in her every wish and fawned upon by admiring friends, it was no wonder that she was, when she chose to be, a most tyrannical specimen of young womanhood.

She had chosen to be such the afternoon she met Richard Holmes, her father's book-keeper, on the street, and allowed him to turn and walk beside her. It was raining, and she graciously closed her own elegant little umbrella to share the larger one he carried.

They had gone on together enjoying the rain, laughing and chatting gayly, gossiping in their light way about this and that happening in the social life of the village.

Perhaps he had chosen an inauspicious moment to declare his love and offer her his hand, but, inauspicious or not, he had spoken and received his answer.

They had exchanged a few hot words and then parted in a sudden frigidity which seized them both. She had added such scorn and disdain to her refusal that it was more than he could bear in silence. She had even insinuated to him that it was not herself he loved, but her father's wealth. She had wounded him cruelly and intentionally, and he had left her suddenly with a cold adieu.

Eloise raised her own umbrella with a defiant little laugh, and a glance at the retreating figure, and then turned homeward humming a fragment of the latest opera.

Her father's bookkeeper! Presume to offer her his hand! It was absurd!

Thus she communed with herself as she went on up the street to her home. She tried to be angry at the presumption of the man, but in spite of herself she could not. She had always admired him—yes, in a way she had quite liked him, and it was pleasing to her vanity to know he loved her—but, marriage—that was another thing, indeed, and quite out of the question!

For days and days it rained. It grew monotonous and wearisome.

Eloise, wandering aimlessly about the drawing room, looking over a book abstractedly; striking a few chords on the piano; going from window to window to look out at the falling rain and the dismal landscape, was [illegible] lonesome and ill at ease.

Why did not some one come! [illegible] Richard Holmes would be a welcome caller, if only to quarrel with. He used to drop in so often [illegible] a game of chess or [illegible] her [illegible]. She wished she had not treated him quite so badly the other day. Why could she not have said, as other girls would have said, that she would be a sister to him? It had never occurred to her to say that. She wished that she had been less unkind that day—wished that she had held him off a little longer at least—it used to be so pleasant to have him drop in for an hour or two.

The day was closing in dark and stormy. Eloise from the window looked at the swollen river, and the pools that stood here and there on the lawn.

Suddenly she stood erect and looked eagerly at a well known figure coming toward the house. It was Richard Holmes.

The girl stood watching his progress eagerly, as he picked his way among the pools of water, her lips parted, her pretty head thrown back, her dark eyes glad and bright.

"I am glad he is coming," she said, softly to herself, as she stood surrounded by the creamy draperies of the window waiting for him.

She heard his firm step on the piazza. She heard him ring the bell and then speak a few words to the maid who opened the door.

Suddenly a great roar filled all the air, drowning the voices in the hall, drowning the silvery chime of the little French clock, drowning every thing, swallowing up every thing in its awful volume of sound. There was a terror in it unlike the heaviest crash of thunder—a strange and terrible menace in the sound, swelling and gathering and growing louder every moment.

Eloise stood paralyzed with fear. She was powerless to cry out, to move herself; she could only stand and listen to that awful, all-pervading roar.

She did not think what it might mean. She had heard vague rumors of fears for the great dam above, but had not heeded.

In a moment it was all over; the sound had come upon her in all its awfulness. She fell back, overpowered with terror, and became unconscious.

A violent blow on her head roused her to herself. She found herself floating on the strong current, borne along at a sickening speed, upheld by the strength and fury of the roaring waters.

Near her she saw the great elm-tree that had stood before the house ever since she was a child. It must have been a branch of that which struck her and brought her back to life.

With great, dark eyes dilated with horror, and a face white and ghastly as the faces of the dead, the girl flew along. She had caught hold of the branches of the great tree, and was clinging with a grasp like death itself. Life was sweet—too sweet to lose. In her first moment of consciousness, she had thought of Richard Holmes. Where could he be? Drowned? O, God forbid—not drowned—the thought was dreadful to her. In a flash she was revealed to herself. She loved him—loved him with her whole heart—had loved him all the time without knowing it. What had he come to the door for that night? It seemed ages ago to her now—to bring a message of warning? Her father—was he safe? O, heaven, that appalling darkness—that dreadful roar of rushing waters!

She raised her voice and called, "Richard!" It was lost in the roar of the flood. She tried again, summoning all her strength, and sending her clear voice out over the waters—"Richard! Richard!"

She thought she heard a human voice, faint and far away—could it be his? He was near her when the flood struck the house; he might be somewhere near her now.

She raised her voice again, and called his name with a desperation born of fear and love. A dark object was floating near her, tossing up and down on the resistless current. She could see that it was a man, clinging to a mass of boards. The face was turned from her, but the head looked familiar. She called again, and the man turned and looked at her.

"Is it you, Eloise?" he screamed; and then she barely heard him—"you, Eloise! Thank God!"

She breathed a sigh of relief. She felt safe now—safe, even on the bosom of this rushing ocean of fierce waters and crashing debris—if he were near.

She saw that he was trying to get to her, but could not; that he dared not loose his hold on the boards and trust himself one instant in that mighty current. She could see his face, white and agonized, turned to her—always turned to her. Something had struck him and cut a gash in his head, and the blood was trickling down his pallid cheek; she could see it from where she clung in the branches of the elm-tree.

She did not know that one beautiful, white arm was bare to the shoulder and bleeding from a cruel blow she had received—she did not realize the pain in her head where the tree had struck her—such things were trivial now. Life was the only thing to be thought of—life—and death—if death should come.

A house came reeling down and struck the mass of boards to which Richard clung. The shock loosened his hold and tossed him far out into the water. The horrible undercurrent sucked him in and he sank from sight. The next moment his white face showed above the water. Such horror and despair Eloise had never seen as she saw there. One last appealing look at her, one cry from her white lips, and he was gone again. Eloise prayed—prayed as she had never dreamed of praying before; crying aloud for help and pity in this time of need.

Richard came to the surface again—near her this time. Could she reach him? Only a little nearer—he was half unconscious and could not help himself. She leaned far out over the dark torrent, holding to the tree firmly with one arm and touched him with her hand—caught him by his collar, and held his head above the water as they were borne along. She called to him wildly. He heard and understood, made one great effort to seize the branches of the tree, and at last, with an almost superhuman strength, drew himself up into the sheltering arms of the old elm.

There he clung with what frail strength was left him; but he was too weak for words. It was no time for speech. The scene was more terrible than any of the imaginings of Dante. Great masses of timbers, that ten minutes before had been houses and homes, came rushing by with shrieking women clinging to them, and little children borne along upon them. Strong men were tossing like egg-shells on the waters, and horses and cattle were plunging madly for life among the ruins of great homes that came crashing by. Now and then, some wild shriek or unearthly moan would mean the death-cry of a human being going down to eternal sleep under the roaring waters.

A great mass of timbers came tearing along down the highway of death; with one blow it sent the elm tree spinning far ahead on the waters. Eloise and Richard were hurled into the air and fell together clinging to whatever they could find—a door, a fence—any thing to keep afloat. At last they climbed to the ridge-pole of a house and clung there. All night they floated, bruised and cut by heavy objects striking them, almost losing their hold many times, but never quite—tossing, plunging, flying with a speed that was terrible.

In the first gray dawn of morning they were rescued. Friendly hands drew them from their perilous position and bore them to a place of safety. There they lay for days unconscious. The shock had been too great—human endurance had been too sorely tried.

The physicians who dressed their wounds and the nurses who cared for them shook their heads gravely over the young strangers given so mercifully into their hands.

Richard woke to consciousness first, but lay with closed eyes, resting and trying to think why he was there and what had happened.

All at once he heard a voice he knew and loved. It was Eloise, delirious with fever. "Richard," she was saying, "I love you now, I loved you all the time, but I did not know it. Richard, did the horrible waters drown you? O, my darling!"

He opened his eyes and looked across the room toward the weak voice dying away into silence. What he saw was Eloise lying on the snowy cot with closed eyes and flushed cheeks—Eloise pitifully thin and changed, but Eloise still, despite the streaks of silver in her dark hair, and the lines of pain on her white brow, left there by the agony of that fatal night.

Richard looking at her [illegible] loved her all the better for the [illegible] of sorrow; they made [illegible] dearer to him; their [illegible] had welded together [illegible] forever.

It was a very [illegible] ceremony that made [illegible] wife. It was no [illegible] making and rejoicing [illegible] poverty were every[illegible] ther was among [illegible] vants were [illegible] friends were gone [illegible] forever. Every [illegible] ther's wealth had [illegible] She was penniless [illegible] home was entirely [illegible] ing that had been [illegible]

Nothing she had [illegible] days was left [illegible] thank God, her [illegible] brave Richard. [illegible] gether through [illegible] their paths [illegible] lay side by side [illegible]

Eloise was a [illegible] woman. What had been [illegible] become good. [illegible] had been vain and foolish, [illegible] beautiful and pure. Her whole nature was changed—her heart ennobled and uplifted, made sweet and womanly and good.

It is no wonder that her husband, tenderly stroking the dark hair with the streaks of silver, smiles and is thankful for her, rejoicing in her as the gift of the flood, which desolated so many hearts—glad and proud that she is in his home and at his fireside.—Harriet F. Crocker, in N. Y. Ledger.

"The wife of an [illegible] is a [illegible], isn't she?" asked [illegible].

"Yes," replied [illegible].

"Well, isn't the wife of a [illegible] a [illegible]?"
